Since, then, the responsibility devolves upon Congress to decide whether the functions of States shall be now restored to those rebellious and lately belligerent communities, how shall we decide it?

For one, I say no! I say no for all the reasons that could influence my decision of such a question.

And first, I say Congress ought not now to restore those suspended functions, because Congress has not been asked to do so.

The election of members to serve in this or the other House, issuing credentials to them, the presentation of such credentials here, is not an application to be restored to the status of States. Such proceedings characterize acknowledged States like New York and Ohio—States which have never forfeited their prerogatives. The fact of issuing such credentials assumes that their functions had not been suspended. We know they have been. The President declares they have been. In April last he distinctly notified all rebellion that they were suspended. Why do they not ask for restoration, present their constitutions, and show us what sort of institutions they propose to establish in place of those they recently placed under the protection of the confederacy? Other communities, when they have sought to enter the circle of American States, have asked permission to do so. Wisconsin asked for it. Until she obtained it she did not assume the right to choose members to represent her in Congress. It is useless to say this right was once conferred upon Louisiana and Mississippi. By rebellion they forfeited the right. In April they were notified the forfeiture would be enforced. Until the forfeiture is remitted they have no right to choose members of this Senate. Until they have the right to choose Senators we ought not to consider the question whether they have chosen them, or whether those chosen have been regularly returned or are properly qualified.

The simple truth is, the representatives of those revolting States left these Halls five years ago without the permission of the nation, and they now propose to come back without its permission. They defied the nation then to keep them in, they defy the nation now to keep them out.

You remember in what mood they left here five years ago. One of them, in debate upon this floor, on the 7th of March, 1861, in reply to Mr. Douglas, spoke as follows:

"Mr. President. I have tried to explain, several times, the position which I occupy. I am not officially informed that the State which I represent here has abolished the office of United States Senator. When I am so advised officially, I shall file at your desk that information; and then if, after being so informed, you shall continue to call my name, I will answer, probably, if it suits my convenience; and if I am called on to vote, I shall probably give my reasons for voting; and, regarding this as a very respectable public meeting, continue my connection with it in that way. At present, though, I am not advised that Texas has withdrawn from the Union, and am waiting those instructions. I said the other night—it was very late, and I hardly recollect it now, not having slept for some forty-eight hours, except when I could take a nap now and then—I said, then, that in consequence of your having refused to recognize the secession of other States, and continue to call the names of their Senators whose official withdrawal had been filed here, I supposed I should continue to attend the meetings of the Senate. If it suits my convenience I certainly shall; if not, not."

Mr. JOHNSON. What Senator was that? Wigfall?

Mr. HOWE. I have read from some remarks made by Mr. Wigfall, of Texas. A few days later Mr. Mason, of Virginia, then a member of this Senate, spoke in opposition to a resolution for the expulsion of a Senator from Texas who had declared he owed no allegiance to the Government of the United States, and he used this language:

"If Senators still persist in saying, as matter of constitutional law, that those States have not separated, that their act is null, they are holding language which—I say it with great respect, for I feel no other sentiment toward them—is more disrespectful to the Senate to-day than that which the Senator from Connecticut says deserves the punishment of expulsion in the case of the Senator from Texas; and why? Because, by their language, they declare that five million people and six or seven sovereign States are in a state of insubordination and insurrection, and they are taking no measures to quell it. They declare here that the acts of those States are null; and, although they have seized what they call the public property, although they have possessed themselves of the forts and of the public arms, yet they take no means whatever, and recommend and propose none, to recover it or to subdue them."

For one, I am unwilling to see those who then burst out of their seats taunting and jeering the majesty of the nation, now come vaulting back into the same seats defying and bullying the nation. If the nation has any authority I would like to see it consulted and respected.

But there is a graver objection still to immediate restoration. It is this: those communities are not now fit to take upon themselves the attributes of States. Our past history has demonstrated that absolute homogeneity is not necessary to the success of republican institutions, if existing differences of opinion do not prevent the exercise of reasonable toleration. But the history of the world has demonstrated that when great malignant antagonisms exist between the members of a State, republicanism must fail of its mission in that State. The powers of a State, even where its political action is confined within the limits prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, are immense for good or evil. A State may determine who may and who shall not participate in the Government; who may or who may not vote at the elections; may exclude whomsoever it pleases from the office of legislator, of judge, of juror, of witness; may make what expenditures it chooses, lay what taxes and contract what debts it chooses. It may regulate labor and control the acquisition and descent of property as it pleases. It may denounce what conduct it chooses as criminal, and impose what penalties it chooses as punishment.

Is it the deliberate judgment of the Senate that these communities are at the present time in that equitable and dispassionate temper of mind which makes them proper depositaries of such enormous powers?

To whom do you mean to assign those great powers which under the Constitution belong to a State? Do you mean to give them to the whole body of the people in these districts? That probably can be done with reasonable safety to them in a short time, but I do not believe it can safely be done yet.

During the past four unhappy years a division has sprung up between different portions of those people unknown to their former history. A gulf yawns between them as broad as that which stretched between the rich man in hell and Lazarus in the bosom of Abraham. That chasm was made by the civil war from which we have just emerged. On one side of it stand all the disloyalty and nearly all the wealth and intelligence in those communities. On the other stand all the loyalty and nearly all the poverty and ignorance in them.

On which side the greater number is to be found I do not know. Probably in some districts it would be found on one side, and in others upon the other side. It cannot be but that the spirit which animates both sides is most unfriendly, not to say malignant.

Hitherto we have seen only the temper which inspires those upon the other side. That is as full of the extract of hell as a rational man would care to see. Those upon this side, upon the American side of the gulf, have as yet been allowed little opportunity of developing the sentiments which actuate them. It cannot well be doubted, though, that the load of hatred and wrong with which they have for years been overborne has engendered feelings of a corresponding nature in their breasts.

When you have once committed this fearful engine known as a State government to a people it is beyond the control of the nation. Thereafter that people must run it to suit themselves. So long as they exercise only the powers permitted by the supreme law they may use them as they will. Whenever, then, you commit this power to the people of one of those districts, it will fall into the hands of one or the other of these antagonistic parties. I submit to you, sir, there is imminent danger that whichever party gets possession of it in their present mood will use it to the utter destruction of the other. We hear much talk about securing guarantees for the future. It was recently said by a distinguished member of the other House while pleading for immediate restoration—

"I would exact at their hands all needed and just guarantees for their future loyalty to the Constitution and the laws of the United States."

For myself, sir, I care less, infinitely less, about security for their future good behavior toward us, than I do for security that they will keep the peace toward each other. Hitherto the United States has been able to take care of itself. I trust she will prove as capable in the future. But a minority under the government of a State in the hands of a majority moved by that active and relentless hate which we have too much reason to believe animates both these factions, and which we know inspires one of them, is helpless and hopeless. Until, therefore, existing animosities have somewhat smoothed down, I would not dare to deliver these suspended functions irrevocably to those people for fear of just such a collision.

There are those among us, sir, I am sorry to know, who propose to avoid such a collision by committing these suspended functions to the white population alone, with power to exclude from participation in them so many of their number as they please.

Mr. President, I am not ready to accept that expedient this year. I do not expect to be next year. I cannot now foresee when I shall be prepared for it. But when I am born again, sir, and have a new gospel committed to me from on high which does not proclaim "peace on earth and good will to men," but proclaims eternal war on earth, and hatred and all uncharitableness to men; which teaches that fraud and rapine are the commanding interests of a republican State, and that Governments should grace treason with laurel wreaths and heap chains upon fidelity; when I hear that gospel from on high—not from below, whence I have heard it all my life—if I accept it, I may be ready to try this expedient, but not until then.

This proposition is to clothe all on the rebel side of the dividing gulf with power and to deny it to nearly all upon this side. This is to make your enemies that controlling, irresponsible majority, and to make your friends that helpless and hopeless minority. This is to put the mill into the exclusive possession of pardoned traitors, and to throw all truth and loyalty into the hopper. That is the entertainment to which we are invited by the immediate restorationists. For one "I can't go." And I do not propose to send any "regrets."

My colleague recently characterized these communities not inaptly as a "boiling caldron of passion and excitement." Into that caldron we are cordially invited to throw all the loyalty there is there, while treason is employed to tend the fires. I must be pardoned if I object to the arrangement. Why, sir, do you remember who these are into whose hands you are asked to consign these enormous powers? They are traitors, and traitors, not to a Government which oppressed them, but to a Government which gave them a monopoly of all the oppression there was practiced under it. They are criminals snatched from the gallows by executive clemency.

Mr. President, you may ransack the history of civilized nations and you cannot find among the rulers who have been deposed for their crimes one who has so unequivocally demonstrated his unfitness for rule as the very class we are now asked to recrown.

I do not ask you to rest upon an assertion. I appeal to the record. If there is any practice which civilization and Christianity condemn it is slavery. But in defiance of that judgment these people persisted in holding three million human beings as the mere chattels of half a million. If there is any principle of government upon which the American people and liberal people everywhere are agreed, it is the principle that opinion and speech ought to be free. Even in these communities every chapter in their codes, every article in their creeds, every measure in their policies, have been opened to free and licensed discussion, save only the rightfulness of slavery. Whoever raised his voice against that has been silenced or banished. In the earlier and better days of the Republic all were agreed that slavery ought not to go beyond the limits of the States in which it existed. But these people not only demanded free ingress for slavery to all the Territories, but in 1861 they waged flagrant war upon the people of the United States because they elected a man for President who was opposed to legalizing slavery in the Territories, and in the prosecution of that war have subjected the nation to an expenditure of three billions of treasure, and to a sacrifice of blood and of life which no man can contemplate without a shudder.

Why, sir, it is the recorded judgment of the nation that these communities are unfit to wield the powers heretofore possessed by the States of this Union. Heretofore American States have had the power to hold portions of their inhabitants in slavery. These communities have all done it. With two exceptions every other community has prohibited it. Against a wrong so gigantic the nation has been compelled to intervene, and has, in the face of an applauding world, deliberately stripped every community within the United States of that power. That judgment was unquestionably just; but who that believes in the universality of human justice does not hang his head at seeing thirteen great American communities arraigned at the bar of public opinion, pronounced guilty of an intolerable abuse of power, and compelled by a national decree to renounce it?

Mr. President, will any one tell me that in spite of all these acts there are many good men in those communities, men as true to their convictions as are to be found anywhere? Who doubts it? Who doubts that Paul, when he threw Christians into prison, compelled them to blaspheme, gave his voice against them when condemned to death, and went snuffing on their track toward Damascus, was as true to his convictions as ever he was? But who believes he was then a suitable or a safe guardian for the disciples of Christianity? I am not clamoring for scaffolds or prisons, or penalties, or forfeitures for the authors of these crimes. Fling them pardons if you choose. If repentance will not come in quest of pardon, send pardon in search of repentance. Give to the rebels life and civil rights, and political privileges; give them offices and honors, if you must; build altars to them, if you will, but; for God's sake, do not sacrifice men on those altars any longer. Will any one tell me that such recurrences to the past are calculated to postpone the era of good feeling for which the country yearns?

Mr. President, the era of good feeling waits for one of two events. It will come when wrong surrenders to right, or when right surrenders to wrong. If it comes with the former event it will stay; if it comes with the latter it will leave early. Those who would have the era of good feeling stay when it comes should strive to hasten the surrender of the wrong, and should resist to the end the surrender of the right. But we are exultingly told that "slavery is abolished," as if now there was no more danger to be apprehended from the abuse of power. Yes, Mr. President, by the ordinance of emancipation three million people have been delivered from the slave pens and taken from the auction blocks. They have been redeemed from the kingdom of chattelism, but they have not been placed in the republic of man. Let us withhold our boasting for the present. Power can make men miserable otherwise than by making them merchandise. Who does not see that if the freedmen are placed under the political control of that white population, emancipation has only transferred them from the individuals who formerly owned them to a close corporation composed of the same persons? And what use is to be made of them then? Sir, we are not blind or deaf, unless we choose to shut our eyes and stuff our ears with cotton; and we cannot fail to know, as well as if their purpose was emblazoned on all the southern heavens, that they mean, in spite of emancipation, to monopolize still the labor of the freedmen, to control its wages, and to appropriate all of its proceeds not demanded for their bare support. To that end you are distinctly informed that, with their consent, the freedmen shall not come to the polls; shall not enter the witness box or the jury box, or sue in the courts; shall not hold lands, nor inherit or transmit property. Oh, but you say, some of those communities have agreed that the freedmen may sue in the courts and swear upon the witness stand. Yes, but will you tell me how, with all these disabilities heaped upon them, they are to be able to employ an attorney to appear for them? Or how, with all this prejudice arrayed against them, they are to find an attorney who dare appear for them? Or how, with all this indignity piled upon them, they are to find a jury that is not instructed not to credit what they say?

But how have even these beggarly concessions, not to justice but toward justice, been secured? How has the consent of either of those communities to the decree of emancipation been obtained? How is it that some of them agreed to annul their ordinances of secession while others have only repealed them? How have some of these communities been induced not to forego, but to postpone, the charge of the debt contracted in aid of the rebellion upon the industry of those communities? Sir, you and I know how it has all been done. It has been done by the efforts of the President. We have seen him, as it were, strip himself and go down into those several arenas, armed with the whip of political exclusion, as I have seen Driesbach go into a cage of lions, and, in the name of national justice, struggle there for some recognition of it. For this labor, in the name of my constituents, I thank him. It was work in the right direction. He has done all it was necessary for him to do. He has demonstrated that those people, if the nation will remit them their forfeited lives and estates and readmit them to political rights, will do whatever the nation demands. In the name of God, then, let the nation demand justice—not the shadow but the body of it; not the semblance but the substance of it.

But, sir, they mean to do more than monopolize the labor of the freedmen; they mean to convince the American people that emancipation was a blunder and a crime. Hence it is that their organs clamor with tales of conspiracies, of idleness, vagrancy, and of crime. Hence it is that Christmas was assigned as the day for a general uprising. Hence it is that on that day, the anniversary of the day on which was born, in Bethlehem of Judea, Jesus, the Saviour of man, it happened that soldiers lately returned from the rebel army, wearing the uniform of the confederacy, within five miles of your Capitol, paraded the streets of Alexandria, doing their utmost to provoke a revolt. Hence it is that throughout that region, still heavily garrisoned by the troops of the nation, in defiance of any local public sentiment, if not in accord with it, and in defiance of the national power, murder sweats at its work of blood." If you, who are responsible for the law of emancipation, ardently desire to be damned for it, you have only to place it in the hands of its most relentless enemies to administer and illustrate. Withdraw the national authority, surrender the protection of the emancipated to the men who formerly owned them, dictate to them what constitutions and what laws you please to-day, so that you give them full authority to repeal them to-morrow, and you know what will happen.

Restored to the prerogatives of States, and in full possession of their seats here, they will coolly tell you that having made one constitution and one code for the Washington market they will proceed to make one for home consumption. Having at your dictation agreed to the act of emancipation, they will, after their own fashion, proceed to show you what it is worth. Having at your bidding waived the payment of the rebel debt, they will proceed to cancel the old bonds and issue new ones for the amount. And when, under their new code, the freedman is excluded from the jury box, the witness stand, the courts, and from the whole remedial law, and from the schools; when their labor is charged with an enormous debt contracted in the effort to perpetuate and intensify their servitude; when the regenerated State shouts to them "Work!" and yet denies them all chance to work except in the employ of their late owners, the great landholders; when the freedman sees that his utmost efforts only secure him a subsistence, which he always had, and that the strictest fidelity secures him no friends, which he once had; when he finds that the tie which linked him to the family of his old master is severed, and that no new tie links him to the family of man, what then?

Sir, I do not doubt that oppression, cunningly devised and persistently applied, can secure a revolt from these freedmen. And what then? Let Jamaica answer. A revolt has been effected there, and with what result? Shakspeare thought to caricature the tireless genius of slaughter when he made the "mad-cap Prince of Wales" describe the "Hotspur of the north" as "he who kills me six or seven dozen Scots at a breakfast; washes his hands, and says to his wife: 'Fie upon this quiet life! I want work.' 'Oh, my sweet Harry,' says she, 'how many hast thou killed to-day?' 'Give my roan horse a drench,' says he, and answers, 'Some fourteen,' an hour after—'A trifle, a trifle.'"

Poetry gives you that for caricature. When you ask the newspapers, those chroniclers of actual events, how many have been killed in Jamaica, they answer, weeks after the event, "from two to four thousand!" As if it only concerns the world to know the number in round thousands and was not necessary to be very particular as to the number of thousands.

I asked a friend of mine, a sagacious chronicler of political results, what would happen if the freedmen were driven to a revolt. He answered, with the quiet appearance of one who, looking upon a clouded sunset, says it will rain to-morrow. "They will be exterminated."

Yes, Mr. President. But when the nation has returned from exterminating the emancipated, with what judgments will they visit the emancipators? Who of us, who are responsible for emancipation, will care to wait for his share of the execration that is sure to follow the act, when we have nothing to show for it but a maddened revolt and a relentless massacre?

But even if protection the most ample was already secured to these freedmen, I should still be unwilling to restore to those communities the functions of States. There is another class of people there who, in my judgment, deserve the attention of Congress. I refer to that class who have the luck to be white but have had the singular taste during the past four years to be loyal. Do we forget that during those last terrible years different portions of each of those rebellious districts have been under the control of different governments, deadly hostile to each other? A part of what we call Louisiana has been under the control of the military authorities of the United States. Those authorities have not only been protecting the territory within their possession against the incursions of rebel forces, but they have, in the absence of any civil government which the United States could recognize, been administering justice between man and man.

It is not to be doubted that in the discharge of these civil functions, as in the exercise of military functions, your authorities have acted in the interest of the United States. It is not to be doubted that they have discriminated in favor of the loyal and against the disloyal. Other portions of the same Louisiana have been under the control of rebel authority. We know very well that they have discriminated against the loyal and in favor of the disloyal. To what extent these discriminations have gone on either side we are not informed. An officer, who has recently been filling a high command in South Carolina, told me he knew of men whose whole estates had been confiscated by the rebel authorities for no other offense than having been true to the flag of the nation. Now, it is deliberately proposed to surrender the whole local authority in each of those districts to those men in whose favor the rebel authorities have discriminated and against whom our authorities have discriminated. Does any man suppose that any government can hereafter be erected by the people of Louisiana, of South Carolina, or of Virginia, which will uphold the judgments of your military commissions, heretofore rendered against rebels, or that will reverse the judgments rendered by rebel tribunals against Union men? Does the United States really mean to suffer all its past action in those districts to be trampled under foot by its enemies, and all the wrong and oppression which have been visited upon its friends to go unredressed?

If your troops had taken possession of a State in Mexico during a war, they would have done what they have done in Louisiana, and for the same reason. And Mexico would have regarded your acts as Louisiana regards them—as the decrees of force and not of law. If the Mexican State should be ceded to the United States the Government of the United States would uphold its prior acts. If the State should be restored to Mexico the treaty of peace would settle the question of the validity or invalidity of what you had done. But you have had no treaty with Louisiana, and you can have none. Only in her new organic law can she abjure the claims or the pretenses upon which she ought not to insist, or upon which you do not mean she shall insist.

Every new State, when she offers herself to the acceptance of the nation, is required to renounce by her constitution whatever claims Congress deems she ought not to prefer, and especially is required to respect, after her admission, whatever has been done by the authority of the nation before her admission.

But, sir, if these people were entirely friendly to each other, there would still, in my judgment, be an insuperable objection to their immediate restoration to the prerogatives of States. That objection lies in the fact that a large and controlling portion of them are still really hostile to the United States. Gentlemen affect to discredit this fact. God knows I would be glad to discredit it; but I cannot. The evidence of it is conclusive and overwhelming.

But you say they have laid down their arms. Yes, Mr. President, being physically unable any longer to hold them up, they have laid them down. But they seek to reënter the community of States! Yes, Mr. President, having found they cannot have control of their own domestic and foreign affairs both, they would, doubtless, like to have the sole control of their domestic affairs only; and having found they cannot successfully fight against the United States, they would, doubtless, like the privilege of sending here some hundred or more representatives to vote against it. But they will take the oath of allegiance! Yes, Mr. President; but the oath they will take is no more binding than that they were under in 1861, when they made flagrant war upon you. But some of them have even renounced the right of secession! Yes, Mr. President, as Galileo renounced the theory of the earth's motion.

But everywhere you see unmistakable evidences that their hearts are unchanged. The uniform of the rebellion is still worn and its songs still sung. In a church of this city last Sabbath, I am told, three gentlemen were seated with the insignia of the rebellion upon them. In Alexandria, on Christmas, men whom your law condemns to death wantonly assaulted men for no other reason than that your law proclaimed them free. In a theater in North Carolina, a short time since, the orchestra played the "Bonnie Blue Flag," and it was received with rapturous applause.

It is suggested that those who parade their evidences of hostility are few in number, and do not represent the feeling of communities. I challenge the Senate to show me what rebel community has ever rebuked such displays. Last week in a theater in Mobile, the orchestra, in playing a medley, carelessly or by design introduced a strain from Yankee Doodle. It was hissed at once. Some officer in command there directed it to be played by the orchestra the next night. It was applauded by those wearing the American uniform, and hissed by others. The papers say that it seemed likely a general tumult was to ensue, and the ladies left the theater. I find here extracts from three Mobile newspapers commenting upon that transaction, and I wish to read portions of these extracts. I read first from the Mobile Tribune of December 30:

"The music of the thing is execrable. We have been averse to that ever since we first heard it. But it was, in some sort, a national air, and that made it respectable. Is it not likely that it was hissed by some person who meant distaste to the music and not the sentiment which it conveys? At all events it was a bit of folly to hiss it under present circumstances."

What are the "circumstances?" Why, we have not got our representatives into Congress yet. Under these circumstances "it was a bit of folly to hiss" an air to which the people of the United States are supposed to be somewhat attached.

"A moiety of the audience was probably composed of those who admire it in every respect. Their feelings and tastes ought to be respected by a genteel audience."

The audience in Mobile was supposed to be "genteel," but not patriotic or loyal.

Besides, we are informed that "Dixie" and the "Bonnie Blue Flag," both of which were considered semi-confederate national airs, are often performed by the orchestra without provoking hisses from that part of the auditorium which is supposed to be averse to them.

"Cannot our people be as polite as their 'Yankee' friends?"

It is a question of politeness!

"We shall take the liberty, also, of informing those who seem to forget it, that this State of Alabama is presumed to be within the Federal Union—that it has no power, even if it had the desire, to put itself in hostility with the central Government."

The Tribune is satisfied on the question of power, but uncommitted on the question of desire.

"It lies yet, in large measure, at the mercy of those who overpowered it. Now, cannot people remember this imposing fact and restrain their prejudices, which can only excite prejudice, and thus lead to disturbances and give the enemies of the State an opportunity to demand that more rigid restraints shall be put on us?"

That means, "Keep still till we get in a position where they cannot put any more restraints upon us; hush for the present; wait till we get out of the woods before you whistle or hiss the whistling."

"We do not take these manifestations of displeasure as meaning anything of the slightest importance, but the indulgence of them may lead to what will be of importance."

"We are not censuring any one"—

Of course not—

"but may conclude with the suggestion to the managers that they had better hereafter omit the performance of all airs which are likely to provoke a repetition of the scene we are alluding to."

"You had better not play Yankee Doodle any more in that theater," says the Tribune.

The Mobile Times of the same date has an article headed "Music and Liberty," in which, after reciting the circumstances, it says:

"Now, with due respect to all parties, the whole of this is wrong."

That is, playing the music and hissing the music, the ordering by the military officers that it be replayed, and hissing it again, is all wrong, says the Times.

"First of all, no law, of either State or Congress, ever made 'Yankee Doodle' a national tune."

They cannot find it in the statute. You have no business to complain that a tune is hissed unless the law declares it to be a national tune, and this is not recognized by the law yet!

"The very words which are adapted to the air exclude any idea of the kind."

The Times goes on to argue that it is really an old Neapolitan fishing song, &c. I will not detain the Senate with that argument. It is curious in itself, and I have no doubt would interest them.

"On the strength of this the tune may be hissed as a musical performance without any direct or indirect insult to our national feelings."

"On the other side, it is true to state that national prejudice has to a great extent adopted this tune as an emblem, and that, right or wrong, it should be respected."

"The Times is too well known as a consistent and independent advocate of peace and conciliation to be suspected of partiality in giving its views."

I do not suspect it of any partiality, in giving its views, between those who hissed a national air and those who played it. Under present circumstances, unquestionably, the Times is neutral. When these circumstances have passed by and you can no longer impose any restraints upon them, I think the neutrality of the Times will be ended, and I do not think there is the slightest doubt on which side of the controversy the Times will appear.

"It might be remarked here," says the Times, "that, as the military authorities never objected to the performance of the 'Bonnie Blue Flag,' 'Dixie,' and other southern tunes, it was in bad taste on the part of the theater to introduce in their musical executions anything calculated to alter the present good feelings."

That is pretty sagacious. The Times has got a remedy. The national authorities down there do not object to the orchestra's playing the Bonnie Blue Flag, and the Times suggests and urges upon the managers of the theater to stick to the Bonnie Blue Flag; then you will have none of this disturbance. Why introduce national airs? Confine yourselves to one class of music, and let that be rebel music!

The Mobile Register of the same date says:

"We are free to admit that it ought not to have been hissed; but surely it was not politic, by playing it, to run the risk of making the theater an arena of a political omelette."

It ought not to have been hissed since the orchestra stumbled on to it, but the managers of the theater ought to have taken care not to have their orchestra stumble on a national tune!

"The officers who took part in this portion of the play 'not in the bills,' must determine for themselves how far they have aided the President in his policy of reconciliation, and to what extent the sum total of 'loyalty' has been increased in the community by the evening's performances."

So says the Register to the officers in command, "You must take care how you insist upon having these national airs played in our theaters; you will balk the President's plan of reconstruction if you do not quit that." [Laughter.] That I read you, Mr. President, from papers that are the advocates of the southern style of loyalty. They are defending them, and this is the way they defend them.

Nowhere can you find but two sentiments;

one that blustering with hostility to the national authority, regardless of consequences, and the other wildly suggesting, "Do not bluster yet; there is too much depending upon our good behavior!"

There are those who flatter themselves that the temper of these communities is improving. My own observations lead me to the conclusion it is constantly growing worse. And I think the fault is less theirs than ours. When the war closed the rebels very evidently and very naturally assumed that as they could not govern the United States they must obey it. Hence they began at once their preparations either to obey the country or to leave it. At once a party sprang to the front prepared to champion the cause of the nation and to uphold its authority. The party was not strong in numbers or in influence. If the nation had stood by it, it would have grown strong, and would soon have become controlling.

But, unfortunately, in a very few months it was proclaimed that the President was in alliance, not with the party that prosecuted the war, but with the party that opposed it; not with the party that elected him, but with the party that opposed his election.

Soon public rumor pointed to Senators, Representatives, and presses who had hitherto supported the national cause, and declared them ready to go with the President wherever the President might choose to go. Then it was declared that we had fought this gigantic war, not to make the rebels obey the United States, but to make them govern their own States; that they would be invested with those governments as soon as they would accept them, and all could see that as soon as the rebels were installed in those governments all who dared to befriend the United States would be subjected to every outrage that political rancor, clothed with the prerogatives of a State, could inflict. Since then the United States has had no friends in those districts. There have been but two parties there: one endeavoring to awe the Government with professions of defiance, and the other endeavoring to cheat it with professions of friendship.

No Government can expect friends, and no Government deserves them, which does not demonstrate its ability, or at least its willingness, to protect them.

But we are told it is not strange that these people should not cherish any very lively regard for the United States at present. Perhaps it is not. But it seems to me surpassing strange that the United States should insist upon thrusting vast political powers into the hands of millions who maintain unrelenting hostility to the national cause.

I therefore conclude that upon every consideration, both of national honor, of national safety, and of local interest, Congress ought not yet to restore the suspended functions of those rebelling States.

But it is said, such is the policy of the President, and my colleague exhorts us in vehement terms to "stand by the President and to uphold his hand." Why, sir, I desire to say to my colleague, and to the President, if he will listen, that we will stand by him if he will stand by the United States. I desire to remind my colleague, and the President, if he will listen, that we have stood by him because he did stand by the United States.

Mr. President, when at Baltimore, in 1864, the representatives of the Union party selected Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, to be their candidate for Vice President of the United States, there was no tie in common between them and him except that both stood committed to the defense of the supremacy of the United States. We knew, then, that if elected there would be one life between him and the command of the Army and Navy of the Union. We knew that if by any providence he should succeed to that command he could surrender both to the enemy. But we did not believe he would do it. No man had given more signal evidences of his devotion to the national cause than he. No man believed more implicitly in the sincerity of that devotion than myself. No man, perhaps, dwelt upon the conclusiveness of those evidences with more grateful enthusiasm than I did in my addresses to my constituents during the canvass of that year. I believe still he was loyal then. I believe still he is loyal now.

Sir, who says the President demands the immediate restoration of those communities to the status of States? Certainly he has not told us so. It is certain, also, the Constitution gives him no authority to make such a demand. It does give him express authority to "recommend" to the consideration of Congress such measures "as he shall judge necessary and expedient." But he has not recommended even any such measure as I have been combating. On the contrary, it seems to me he has studiously forbore to make any such recommendation.

"And if an angel should have come to me, And told me Hubert should put out mine eyes, I would not have believed no tongue but Hubert's."

And let who will come and tell me the President would surrender one of the choicest prerogatives of the national supremacy, and would surrender the protection of its freedmen, its heroic soldiers, and its faithful friends to their direct enemies, I will believe no tongue but the President's. Whatever may be thought of what he has already done, it should be remembered he has not acted in defiance of congressional direction, but in want of it—a want which I have often urged the Senate to attempt to supply.

Besides, sir, if I knew that the President differed from the views I have here advanced, I cannot forget it was Wisconsin that placed me here and not the President.

I believe that to-day I have given utterance to the convictions which animate the loyal people of Wisconsin. I know I have given utterance to my own convictions, deliberately formed and long cherished. And I trust the President has too fine an appreciation of the office of representative to expect or wish any one to betray the dictates of his own conscience or his own constituents to echo the views of the Executive.

Sir, let the day be far distant when the Senate shall be seriously importuned to surrender its own convictions of duty to executive dictation. And if the day shall ever come when the Senate shall yield to such importunity, then the American system will be destroyed, and the fragments only will remain to be scrambled for.

But because these people are not yet prepared to resume their suspended functions, does it follow that they must be left to the control of military authority? By no manner of means. The objections to that are second only to those I have urged against immediate restoration. I cannot detain the Senate by a recapitulation of them.

Upon this point I content myself with citing the argument presented by the late message of the President:

"Now, military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of discontent; would have divided the people into the vanquishers and the vanquished; and would have engendered hatred, rather than have restored affection. Once established, no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration to and from that portion of the country is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony; and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home, would place himself willingly under military rule? The chief persons who would have followed in the train of the Army would have been dependents on the General Government, or men who expected profit from the miseries of their erring fellow-citizens. The powers of patronage and rule which would have been exercised, under the President, over a vast and populous and naturally wealthy region, are greater than, unless under extreme necessity, I should be willing to trust to any one man; they are such as, for myself, I could never, unless on occasions of great emergency, consent to exercise. The willful use of such powers, if continued through a period of years, would have endangered the purity of the general administration and the liberties of the States which remained loyal."

To my mind this argument is unanswerable. But one expedient then is left. That is to organize provisional governments for each of those districts. Give them Governors and judges appointed by the national authority. Give them

Legislatures chosen by the people of the districts, reserving to Congress a veto upon any laws designed to oppress any portion of the people. Allow them also to be represented in one or both Houses of Congress by Delegates chosen by themselves. This is precisely what has been done in every case where any considerable number of our citizens have been found without the limits of organized States. It was done for those people who poured out of the old States to settle the Territories northwest of the Ohio. It was done for those people who inhabited the territory we purchased from France, and for those inhabiting the territory we conquered from Mexico. The reason for doing it was precisely the same in every case. There were people to be governed, and they were not prepared for State governments. The reason is the same in this case. There are people who must not be left to anarchy, and they are not fitted to be clothed with the prerogatives of States.

But gentlemen say this is radical, and the times demand conservative measures. Why, sir, if gentlemen will say what it is they wish to conserve, I can better say whether this will answer their purpose.

If they wish to conserve the supremacy of the nation, this will enable them to do it, for it retains authority in the hands of the nation until the late belligerents are prepared to wield it in harmony with the national interests. If they wish to conserve the equality of men, this enables them to do it, for it will enable the nation to forbid any class of men from being placed beyond the protection of law. If they wish to conserve the integrity of the States, this will enable them to do it, for it respects the rights of every State which has not forfeited its own functions. If they wish to protect the national debt, this will enable them to do it, for it guards that debt, for a time at least, against the machinations of those who are most hostile to it. If they wish to conserve the people of the revolted States against the payment of the rebel debt, this enables them to do it. If they wish to conserve the peace in those insurrectionary districts, this enables them to do it, and to employ for that purpose the whole authority and the whole power of the nation. If they wish to conserve the cause of emancipation, it will enable them to do it, for it will enable them to make emancipation a blessing to both the master and the freedman. If they wish to conserve what loyalty there is in those districts, and to hasten its development, this will enable them to do it, for it will demonstrate to the world that it is no longer dangerous to be loyal. If they wish to conserve the rights of those Union men whose fidelity has been visited with penalties by rebel tribunals, or to conserve those rights which now rest upon the decrees of our own military tribunals in the revolted districts, this will enable them to do it.

Mr. President, I cannot foresee what will be the judgment of Congress upon the great problems now confronting it. If they can find a shorter and truer path to safety and peace than this, I will gladly accompany them in it. For myself, I have looked for such a path for four years, and I have been wholly unable to see any other than this. I earnestly invoke the Senate to try it.

Mr. President, I know of nothing in the life of Christ more touching, or, if you think of it, more terrible, than that scene narrated by His first biographer when, standing in the temple and contemplating the great destruction that was soon to overtake the city, He exclaimed:

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!"

"Behold, your house is left unto you desolate."

And when I remember how the Almighty has held us by the hand during the late deadly struggle, how He has led us more visibly than He ever did any other people since He guided the Israelites out of Egypt; how we in these very days have seen Him again part the Red sea that this nation might walk through dry; and when I contemplate the possibility that we may refuse after all to cross the river of prejudice that lies before us, that we may not be able even now to cast off the idea that "they are all giants" on the other side, that we may not after all dare to be sensible, that we may leave those who have been sent to us to be stoned by their enemies, I sometimes think I hear the same Jesus bending from the great white throne, where He sitteth evermore by the side of the Father, and exclaiming with the same infinite tenderness, O America, America, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not; henceforth your house is left unto you desolate.

Mr. President, I move that this resolution, if there is no occasion for its further consideration at present, be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member withdraw that motion for a moment that I may say a word or two?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly, I withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rise with no view to express any opinion upon the questions which have been considered by the Senator from Wisconsin. In the relation in which I stand to some of these questions, you having done me the honor to place me upon the committee on reconstruction, it would be in very bad taste, as I think, to trouble the Senate with any views of my own which may possibly be changed by the deliberations of that committee. There is, however, one question which involves a construction of the Constitution in a particular, as I think, vital to its existence, upon which, very briefly, I invite the attention of the Senate. The honorable member from Wisconsin seems to suppose, indeed has so asserted—

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps the Senator would like an adjournment, and if he will give way I will move it.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I do not intend to speak more than ten or fifteen minutes. I would rather go on now if the Senate are willing to listen. I am not anxious to go into executive session or to adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. We can take this up tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting that motion, the Chair will lay before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 21, 1865, information in relation to the charges against Jefferson Davis, and the reasons why he is held in confinement and has not been put upon his trial; which was, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Had not that communication better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HOWARD. Not yet. Let us see what it is first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 11, 1865, information respecting the occupation by French troops of the republic of Mexico and the establishment of a monarchy there; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 19, 1865, information in regard to plans to induce the immigration of dissatisfied citizens of the United States into Mexico, and especially in regard to the plans of Dr. William M. Gwin and M. F. Maury; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 7) for increasing the bond of the Superintendent of Public Printing.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 24) for the relief of Lucretia M. Perry, widow of the late Nathaniel H. Perry, United States Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is understood that there are several executive messages on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after a short time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 10, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to present the memorial of Hon. Charles Follett, contesting the seat of Hon. COLUMBUS DELANO as Representative from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a question of privilege. My colleague, Hon. MORGAN JONES, is present and desires to qualify.

Hon. MORGAN JONES, Representative-elect from the fourth congressional district of New York, appeared, and having taken the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and the act of July 2, 1862, took his seat.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, commencing where the call was suspended yesterday.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the special order for the 17th instant, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing where the call was suspended yesterday, with the State of Pennsylvania.

PAY OF ASSISTANT DOORKEEPER.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the salary of O. S. Buxton, First Assistant Doorkeeper of this House for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, be made equal to that of the reading clerk.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the following resolutions, passed by the National Association of Tobacconists, in convention held at the Cooper Institute, in the city of New York, November 22, 1865, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a request to inquire into the expediency of submitting, at an early day, an act amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, so as to conform to the suggestions therein contained:

"Whereas the present law relating to the manufacture of tobacco, and assessing a tax upon it, has, during the past three years of its operation, fully and conclusively demonstrated to the members of this association, and to all others connected with the manufacture of tobacco, its utter injustice and unadaptability to the nature and requirements of the trade, as well as to the wants of the Government, in the impossibility of its stringent and impartial enforcement, thereby, in reality, offering a reward for the evasion of the payment of the tax, and for the defrauding the Treasury of its just dues; and whereas under the present law those manufacturers who have always willingly paid their taxes, and gladly strengthened the hands of the Government financially, find their business fast passing from them under the control of irresponsible and dishonest men, whom the present law cannot punish, as the statistics of the department of internal revenue conclusively show; and whereas, owing to the depressing influence of the present law, every department of the trade is entirely prostrated and many workmen are thereby thrown out of employment and thus divested of the means of honest support; and whereas it is the unanimous conviction of the members of this association, founded upon the experience of the past three years with the workings of the internal revenue law, as it relates to the manufacture of tobacco and cigars and snuff in this country, and is strengthened by the workings of similar laws in other countries, that the removal of the tax from the manufactured article to the raw material or leaf will impart a healthy tone to the trade, in protecting the manufacturer and workmen from the covert and sinister operations of irresponsible and dishonest parties, and will increase the revenue to the national Treasury by several million dollars annually: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the members of this association respectfully but urgently request Congress to remove the tax from manufactured tobacco to the raw material or leaf, as an act of justice to the honest manufacturer, an act which can work no injury to the growers, and at the same time as an act of precaution to protect the public Treasury from fraud.

Resolved, That as the tariff on imported cigars valued at fifteen dollars per thousand or less is at present from twenty to thirty per cent. less than the duties levied by the Government on quality of cigars manufactured in this country, thus offering a premium to the foreign rather than to the home manufacturer, therefore we deem it the imperative duty of Congress to raise the tariff on imported cigars to an amount at least equal to that paid by the home manufacturer."

CHANNEL AT HELL GATE.

Mr. RAYMOND submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the feasibility of deepening the channel at Hell Gate, East river, New York, so as to allow the ingress and egress of vessels of war and commerce; and if, by modern discoveries and inventions, it shall be found practicable to deepen or widen said channel, the said committee is hereby instructed to report a bill to effect the desired object.

DUTY ON COTTON FABRICS.

Mr. WINFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of lessening the import duty on cotton fabrics, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

THE PREVIOUS QUESTION.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following resolution: Resolved, That the previous question was designed as a means of reasonable limitation of debate, and not for the entire suppression thereof, and that a due regard both for the public interests and the rights of minorities requires that no measure involving important questions of principle or policy ought to pass this House without a reasonable opportunity for debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

REPORTER OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to report to this House what compensation, if any, has been paid to any reporter or reporters appointed under a resolution of the House passed January 5, 1865, and what services have been rendered by such reporter or reporters, whether such appointment ought to be longer continued, and if so, whether the present rate of compensation is excessive.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What disposition does the gentleman propose to make of that resolution?

Mr. HALE. It is a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the Committee of Accounts would probably be the proper committee to take charge of this matter. The Committee of Accounts audits these bills.

Mr. HALE. I will modify the resolution in that respect. I supposed the Committee on Public Expenditures was the proper committee. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

INCOME TAXES.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested, as early as possible, to revise the entire system of income taxes, and if found impracticable to dispense with the whole system, that they make such modifications as will provide, first, for raising the amount now free from income tax from $600 to $1,200 per annum; second, to reduce the present percentage on all incomes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to refer that resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOGAN. The resolution is simply in the nature of a request.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It seems to me that the resolution is mandatory. I think it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was agreed to.

CONTRACTS WITH FREEDMEN.

Mr. WARD submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that a form of contract to be entered into between the freedmen and their former masters in the State of South Carolina, has been adopted by certain Government officials on the one side, assuming to represent the freedmen, and their former masters on the other side, whereby, among other things, it is provided that the freedman becomes the servant of the master for the period of one year; that he shall not be permitted to leave the premises where he is bound to labor, or to receive visits from relatives or friends thereon during said time without the master's consent, nor without such consent to keep any poultry, stock, &c., during the time; that if said freedman is absent for two days without the master's consent, no matter for what cause, he forfeits his whole year's pay, part of which goes to his master; that if any team, horses, mules, or farming utensils are injured while being used by the freedmen such damage shall be deducted from their wages, it not being specified that such liability should only be incurred when the freedman was at fault; and in case of any breach of any of the provisions of the contract by any servant he shall be liable to forfeit all his wages and be dismissed from the plantation; and whereas it is alleged that said freedmen are being induced to enter into such contracts: Therefore,

Resolved, That the select committee on freedmen be instructed to inquire into the truth of said allegations, and also to ascertain what contracts, if any, are being forced upon the freedmen of other States, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WARD. I call the previous question upon agreeing to the preamble and resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The preamble and resolution were agreed to.

CRUTCHES AND ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to consider the expediency of exempting from internal revenue duty the manufacture of crutches and artificial limbs, which is now an onerous tax on disabled soldiers.

POLICY OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House cherish the most entire confidence in the patriotism and policy of the President of the United States, and in his desire to restore the Union on the basis of permanent prosperity and peace, and that the cooperation of this House is pledged to him in support of the general policy of reconstruction inaugurated by him in the modes authorized by the Constitution and consistent with the security of republican institutions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I raise the point of order that this resolution should go to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate, under the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. I think not. I offer this resolution for the purpose of debate, and in proper order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order taken by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] the resolution not referring specially or directly to the subject of representation. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] rising to debate the resolution, it goes over under the rule.

JEFFERSON DAVIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. CONKLING, by unanimous consent submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House any report or reports made by the Judge Advocate General, or any other officer of the Government, and as to the grounds, facts, or accusations upon which Jefferson Davis, Clement C. Clay, Jr., Stephen R. Mallory, and David L. Yulee, or either of them, are held in confinement.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the resolution; and moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF COUNTERFEITING.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to punish counterfeiting with death; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENITENTIARY IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the construction of a jail, penitentiary, and house of correction in and for the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

QUALIFICATION OF ELECTORS.

Mr. ROLLINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the amendment of the Constitution, authorizing Congress to define the qualifications and provide for the election of electors of President and Vice President, and of members of Congress; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ORTH asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, leaving copies, the papers in the case of Peter Wheeler.

Mr. BEAMAN asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition of W. A. Noble and others, asking for an appropriation for the purpose of repairing a breach in the Government canal at Monroe harbor.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

EXTRA PAY OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, also introduced a joint resolution in reference to three months' extra pay of prisoners of war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

and time, ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire why it is necessary to authorize an increase to so large an amount.

Mr. LAFLIN. I would state that when the law was enacted authorizing the erection of this department of public printing, it was provided therein that the Superintendent of Public Printing might draw from the public Treasury two thirds of the amount of his bond. At that time the expenditures in that department were less than one quarter of what they are now. The bond was fixed at $40,000. Under the law as it now stands he is unable to draw over $26,000, and he has been obliged for the last two years to draw upon his private credit to meet the current expenses of his department. He simply asks at the hands of Congress that they should so modify that law as to enable him to draw just double that sum. As I understand it—and I make that reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]—it is not necessary that Congress should take any further action, except simply to authorize him to increase his bond to $80,000.

The question then recurred on the passage of the joint resolution, and it was passed.

Mr. LATHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the joint resolution; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant asking for information in regard to the alleged kidnapping in Mexico of the child of an American lady, a report of the Acting Secretary of State to whom the resolution was referred.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill entitled "An act relating to invalid pensions;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

QUARTERMASTER AND COMMISSARY RECEIPTS.

Mr. SPALDING offered the following joint resolution, and desired action thereon:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That all loyal persons in any part of the United States who hold quartermaster or commissary receipts or certificates for articles of food or raiment used by the Army of the United States, or ostensibly taken for their use, shall be entitled to have the same audited and paid under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of this resolution who was in active opposition to the Government and laws of the United States at the time his property was so taken as aforesaid.

Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. CONKLING objected.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire simply to correct one word in the act we passed two years ago. By the construction given to it by the War Department these receipts cannot be audited and paid if the property was taken from a loyal man in a disloyal State. The object is to have the law extend to the disloyal States as well as the loyal, provided the person was himself loyal. The Military Committee say there is no necessity for that law.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad there is a difficulty about it. I think it was a very injudicious and improvident measure.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to that reference.

PENSIONS.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into what additional legislation, if any, is necessary to facilitate the procuring of pensions by those entitled thereto, the attention of the committee being especially directed to the fifth rule prescribed by the Commissioner of Pensions in his circular of instruction and forms to be observed in applying for Army pensions under the act of July 14, 1862, (second edition, 1863,) and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

The next business in order was the consideration of the following resolution heretofore offered by Mr. DUMONT:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures of the Interior Department be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That committee was never known to have met.

Mr. ORTH. My colleague is detained from his seat by sickness, and I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will consent that the resolution lie over until he is present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. It provides that from all laws and parts of laws prescribing the qualifications of electors for any office in the District of Columbia the word "white" be, and the same is hereby, stricken out, and that from and after the passage of this act no person shall be disqualified from voting at any election held in the said District on account of color; and that all acts of Congress and all laws of the State of Maryland in force in said District, and all ordinances of the cities of Washington and Georgetown inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed and annulled.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to enter a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not ask action upon it now.

The jurisdiction of Congress over the subject-matter of this bill is unquestionable. It is the right of Congress—

"To exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."—Constitution, Art. 1, sec. 8.

"Exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever," is the language of the broad and comprehensive grant of power upon which the right of Congress to pass this bill rests. This is too plain a proposition to admit of debate, and I leave the question of power to give my attention to some other considerations connected with this bill which it may not be unprofitable to discuss.

The Constitution not only confers the indisputable power to which I have referred, but it seems also to invite the identical legislation which the pending measure provides. Nowhere in the Constitution do we find class distinctions applied to citizens of the United States. Its ample folds envelop all citizens alike. It in no way develops color of skin as a tenure to the rights and privileges of citizenship. The citizen, be he high or low, rich or poor, white or black, finds the Constitution of his country as full of justice to him as it is to any other. Looking into its bright face as into a mirror, he sees himself reflected a citizen; and of this there is never a failure. This is the crowning glory of our Constitution. The whitest face can draw nothing from that mirror but the image of a citizen, and the same return is given to the appeal of the black face. If ever aught else appears, be sure you are not looking into the broad, bright surface of the real Constitution, for it never varies, never lies.

If all over this land this same grand feature of our national Constitution had a resting-place in every other constitution and in every law, then indeed would we be "A free republic, where, beneath the sway

Of mild and equal laws, framed by themselves,
One people dwell, and own no lord—save God."

But this is not so, nor can we make it so. Our powers reach not so far as this. State constitutions and State laws, covered over with the wreck of human rights, block up the way, and we may not overleap these barriers. The real Republic may be a long ways off yet, but we are approaching it, and shall, in the course of time, realize it in its fullness. But however far it may be in the future, however difficult of approach may these State barriers render it, we should see in them but additional incentives urging us to the performance of the duty which rests with us, in order that the example of the nation may induce the States to aid in hastening the development of a perfect Republic.

I have said that the Constitution seems to invite the passage of this bill; and is this not true? Why should the statute-law, made or tolerated by Congress for the government of citizens of the United States within the District of Columbia, establish class privileges or distinctions on account of color, when no such things are found in the Constitution? Should not the statute-law for the special government of such citizens as reside in the capital of the Republic be as just, as broad, as comprehensive, as humane as the Constitution? Should there not be harmony here? If the Constitution refuses to know the color of the citizen's skin, why should the statute-law be wiser? If the former refrains from trampling on the great truth which glitters like a jewel of the first water in the heart of the old declaration, that "all men are created equal," and that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," why should the latter put its unhallowed foot upon this grand central idea of our system and crush it under the very folds of the nation's flag as it floats on the dome of the Capitol? Why hinge the sacred right of suffrage in this District on the word "white," when the Constitution discards it entirely? Let these things not be. Let us heed the invitation of the Constitution, and breathe the breath of true republican life into the body of our laws—of peculiar application to this District at least. Here, at least, let our faith in the great self-evident truth that formed the pivot upon which the fathers turned their hopes, their energies, and their justification when battling for that independence which proved to be the birth of this nation, be made manifest by works full of justice and mercy.

I do not claim that the right of suffrage is a natural right to which every person subject to human government is entitled. It is not a natural right, for where natural rights alone obtain there is no right of suffrage. But this state of things can only exist in the absence of properly adjusted civil government. The right of suffrage is a political right, and is the attendant of civil government. This, however, renders it no less sacred than it would be if it were a natural right. We always class it among the rights. We speak of it as the right of suffrage, and never give it the more doubtful designation of the privilege of suffrage. Whenever and by whomsoever it is spoken of it is always given the royal title of right. It is not something which is given as a matter of grace to the citizen by a Government which "derives its just powers from the consent of the governed," for it is the medium through which that consent is accorded. It is the check of the citizen upon the Government, and it would be mere mockery for the latter to pretend to act within the limits of the consent of the former in the absence of means whereby such consent could be made known. Of course this consent must be made known by the voice of the majority, for that is the bond of government established at the beginning. This has been consented to. But it is not competent for the majority to deprive the minority of anything which justly belongs to the things properly denominated rights; and one of these is, in my judgment, the right of suffrage. The office of this right under civil government is kindred to that which belongs under natural law to the right of self-defense. Not that the right of self-defense as established by natural law is supplanted by the right of suffrage when civil law assumes its sway over a people; for then both exist, the latter being a cumulative right rendered necessary by the new relations, rights, interests, privileges, and obligations resulting from the ordination of civil government. In a state of nature man must rely on his powers of force and persuasion for the defense of his rights. Within certain limitations, he may rely on the same means of defense after the institution of civil government, and the law justifies or excuses him according to the circumstances of the particular case. But a thousand cases arise from the action of the Government and of persons when some different and more potent engine than words and fists is required. A man attacked in his person or his property may drive off the aggressor by the use of his natural means of defense. This he may do in the absence or presence of civil government. It is his natural right to do so. But a citizen attacked in his personal liberty or his property by unjust laws, or by the maladministration of just laws by corrupt public officers, or by ignorant and incompetent administrators of the law, must defend himself by resort to other means. What means shall be placed at his disposal? Absolutists tell us that the love of the monarch for his subjects will supply the needed remedy; but as republicans we turn our backs upon this false theory, and affirm that the means of defense must be placed in the keeping of the citizen. When the monarch forgets the theoretical love upon which his system is based, and encroaches upon the rights of his subjects, force is their resort, and the trial is by battle. We, in accepting the republican system, are provided with a more effective and peaceful mode of redress. We meet encroachments on our rights with the swift and telling power which lies in the ballot. We rid ourselves of unjust laws by disposing of unjust law-makers. We remedy the evils springing from an improper administration of our laws by changing our public officers. We protect our rights by hedging them about with protective laws made, practically, by ourselves. These are all defensive acts, and the weapon by which we achieve them is the ballot.

Civil Governments were not instituted for the purpose of depriving men of their natural rights, but rather for the better protection of these rights. What were natural rights before, now become civil rights, and each possessor of them is entitled to an equal participation in the employment of the means established for their defense, except so far as the good of the whole may require some limitations on this general rule. But whatever limitations be adopted must always be just and impartial. Some very proper limitations do now exist, while others are gross and flagrant violations of every rule of justice and impartiality, and subversive of the ends and purposes of government. Why should the color of a man's skin deprive him of the political right of defense? He may exercise the natural right of defense the same as other men whose skins are of color less objectionable. Natural law makes no distinctions between its subjects in this regard. Why should the civil law interpose a different rule? Are not men's rights as dear and as sacred under civil government as they are in the absence of it? Can we excuse ourselves in continuing a limitation on the right of suffrage in the capital of the Republic that has no justification in reason, justice, or in the principles on which we profess to have based our entire political system? Upon this question there seems to have been but little difference of opinion among the men who laid the foundation and built the superstructure of this Government. In those days no limitation was placed upon the enjoyment of the defensive rights of the citizen, including the right of suffrage, on account of the color of the skin, except in the State of South Carolina. All of the other States participating in the formation of the Government of the United States had some limitation, based on sex, or age, or property, placed upon the right of suffrage; but none of them so far forgot the spirit of our Constitution, the great words of the Declaration of Independence, or the genius of our institutions, as to inquire into the color of a citizen before allowing him the great defensive right of the ballot. It is true, that as the Republic moved off in its grand course among the nations a change occurred in the minds and practices of the people of a majority of the States. The love of liberty, because of its own great self, and not because of its application to men of a particular color, lost its sensitive character and active vitality. The moral sense of the people became dormant through the malign influence of that tolerated enemy to all social and governmental virtue, human slavery. The public conscience slumbered, its eyes closed with dollars and its ears stuffed with cotton. When these things succeeded the active justice, abounding mercy, and love of human rights of the earlier days, State after State fell into the dark line of South Carolinian oppression, and adopted her anti-republican limitation of the right of suffrage. A few States stood firm and kept their faith, and to-day, when compared with the bruised and peeled and oppression-cursed State of South Carolina, stand forth as shining examples of the great rewards that are poured upon the heads of the just. Massachusetts and South Carolina, the one true, the other false to the faith and ideas of the early life of the nation, should teach us how safe it is to do right, and how dangerous it is to do wrong; how much safer it is to do justice than it is to practice oppression.

But, sir, not the States alone fell into this grievous error. The General Government took its stand upon the side of injustice, and apostatized from the true faith of the nation, by depriving a portion of its citizens of the political right of self-defense, the use of the ballot. What good has come to us from this apostasy? Take the history of the municipal government of this city, and what is there in its pages to make an American feel proud of the results of this departure from the principles of true democracy? Is there a worse governed city in all the Republic? Where in all the country was there to be found such evidences of thriftless dependence as in this city before the cold breath of the North swept down here during the rebellion and imparted a little of "Yankee" vigor to its business and population? Where within the bounds of professed fidelity to the Government was true loyalty at a lower ebb and sympathy with the rebellion at higher flood; freedom more hated and emancipation more roundly denounced; white troops harder to raise and black ones more heartily despised; Union victories more coldly received and reverses productive of less despondency than right among that portion of the voting population and its adjuncts which control the local elections in this District? With what complaisance the social elements of this capital fostered the brood of traitors who rushed hence to the service of the rebellion in 1861. Are these fruits of our error pleasing?

A few days ago a special election was held in this city for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the electors relative to the proposition we are now considering, to restore to the colored citizens of this District the right of suffrage in order that they may defend themselves against the oppressions of the present ruling class. The friends of equal rights abstained from voting. The enemies of impartial suffrage cast some seven thousand votes. How many were fraudulent no man can tell. The present holders of power decline to divide it. I doubt not that these seven thousand votes could have been polled against the abolition of slavery in this District. A large majority of those who cast these votes love slavery and hate freedom. They love to vote themselves, but they are opposed to extending the same privilege to other men. We know they were opposed to emancipation. We know they are opposed to impartial suffrage. We overrode their desires in the former case, and the whole loyal portion of the nation shouted for joy because the capital of the Republic was made free. I trust we shall make the country glad in the present case by again overruling the selfishness of this people, by placing in each man's hands the power to defend his own freedom and rights, and at the same time so reinforce the true men who refused to participate in the recent election that they, with the new voting population, can for all time control the municipal governments of Washington and Georgetown in the interests of freedom, humanity, justice, and the true principles of popular government.

The seven thousand voters who do not want other men to vote are not sure that the voice of the ballot-boxes, which, doubtless, received many ballots from fingers that have pulled rebel triggers, will be heeded by us, and therefore, as is currently reported, many of them are willing to compromise the difficulty by assenting to a repeal of the municipal charters, and to the government of the two cities by a commission to be appointed by the President. This is advancing from bad to worse. When men will surrender their own rights rather than respect the rights of others their political demoralization is complete. That this political debasement should exist in the capital of the Republic is a burning, blistering disgrace, which demands a speedy and vigorous remedy. This is not a case in which it is best to "make haste slowly." The good name of the nation requires swift justice in our treatment of this worst development of pro-slavery bigotry. The remedy is not to disfranchise those who come forward and offer to sacrifice their own right to the elective franchise upon the altar of narrow and disgraceful prejudice, but to neutralize the evil use of the right by such persons by extending the same right to those who will use it well. As a punishment for so craven a betrayal of the sacred character of the ballot, it might seem just to inflict a deprivation of its use; but this is the day of "good feeling" and of pardon, and we will not punish. I would not be vindictive, I would be just. I do not want to legislate against the white citizen for the purpose of advancing the interests of the colored citizen. It is best to guard against all such legislation. Let the laws which we pass here be of such pure republican character that no person can tell from the reading of them what color is stamped upon the faces of the citizens of the United States. Let us have no class legislation, no class privileges. Let our laws be just and uniform in their operation. This is the smooth sea upon which our ship of state may sail; all others are tempestuous and uncertain.

And now, Mr. Speaker, who are the persons upon whom this bill will operate, if we shall place it upon the statute-book of the nation? They are citizens of the United States and residents of the District of Columbia. It is true that many of them have black faces, but that is God's work, and He is wiser than we. Some of them have faces marked by colors uncertain—that is not God's fault. Those who hate black men most intensely can tell more than all others about this mixture of colors. But, mixed or black, they are citizens of this Republic, and they have been, and are to-day, true and loyal to their Government; and this is vastly more than many of their contemners can claim for themselves. In this District a white skin was not the badge of loyalty, while a black skin was. No traitor breathed the air of this capital wearing a black skin. Through all the gradations of traitors, from Wirz to Jeff. Davis, criminal eyes beamed from white faces. Through all phases of treason, from the bold stroke of Lee upon the battle-field to the unnatural sympathy of those who lived within this District, but hated the sight of their country's flag, runs the blood which courses only under a white surface. While white men were fleeing from this city to join their fortunes with the rebel cause, the returning wave brought black faces in their stead. White enemies went out, black friends came in. As true as truth itself were these poor men to the cause of this imperiled nation. We know, and the world knows, how little cause we had given for this intense devotion. Our heel had been that of the oppressor upon the necks of this people for a century. Our statutes, defying our Constitution, had made a hounding mass of our white population to hunt down the fleeing bondmen. Our flag was no emblem of freedom to them. No home, nor wife, nor child, nor hour of rest, nor moment of devotion belonged to them. They toiled and groaned and wore out their lives, not knowing that the stern face of the Government, always turned upon them disfigured by a frown, could ever wear a smile. Their past was a blank, their present a burden, their future the grim promise of increased oppression. Their dark, patient faces were but emblematic of the black blank which life's lottery held for them. We had no right to demand of them devotion; and they had no cause for offering it to us. But how greatly to-day are we their debtor!

The hour of our trial came. The pampered sons of the nation sounded the notes of war. Armies of white-faced traitors pressed us sorely on every hand; not because they had been oppressed, for they had controlled the Government. We tried to preserve peace with them, and as a part of the price we offered to make our oppression of the colored race perpetual. Our terms were spurned, our faces were slapped, war was pressed upon us defiantly, insolently, and we were forced to draw the sword to save ourselves. The hosts poured in on either side for battle. The men beneath our heel cried out to us, "Let us help you." We answered, "No;" picked them up and threw them, all dangling with chains, into the lines of our foes. But they would not stay. They would be faithful, would be true, in spite of us. We ordered our forces to turn them back, and told them our soldiers were their enemies. They heeded not this madness, but wherever they found a suffering soldier of the Republic they ministered to his every need to the fullest extent of their humble ability. Did he need food, they divided their scanty store with him; did he need shelter, they found for him that which was safe; did he need a guide, they gave up their hours of rest and led him through forest and swamp to the lines of the Union; always friendly, never false.

Through experience we gained wisdom. The time came when we lifted our heel and called on the oppressed to help us save the nation which had been so cruel to them. They needed not a second call, but responded to the first, two hundred thousand strong. From this District more than a fair proportion of black men went into the Army. Three thousand five hundred and forty-nine marched out from this District to defend the nation. They took the risks which justly belonged to the white residents who now offer to give up their own right to vote rather than have the same right conferred on the colored men of the District. As well as they could, perhaps not as efficiently as the white troops, but at least as well as they could, and in many cases as well as any could, these colored troops discharged their duties as soldiers of the Government which had oppressed them so sorely, so wantonly. Many of them are buried with their white comrades on scores of battlefields. Wherever we have trusted them they have been true. Why will we not deal justly by them? Why shall we not, in this District, where the first effective legislative blow fell upon slavery, declare that these suffering, patient, devoted friends of the Republic shall have the power to protect their own rights by their own ballots? Is it because they are ignorant? Sir, we are estopped from that plea. It comes too late. We did not make this inquiry in regard to the white voter. It is only when we see a man with a dark skin that we think of ignorance. Let us not stand on this now in relation to this District. The fact itself is rapidly passing away; for there is no other part of the population of the District so diligent in the acquisition of knowledge as the colored portion. In spite of the difficulties placed in their pathway to knowledge by the white residents, the colored people, adults and children, are pressing steadily on. Their schools are well supported and well attended, and, aside from this, these people always knew enough to be true to the Government. They have labored and suffered for the common cause in every way possible for men to labor and suffer. And here let us remember that it is not always the ignorant man who makes the unsafe voter. The vicious man is the unsafe voter. The educated rebel voted against the best interests of the country long before he took up arms to destroy the Government which protected him. A man who loves his country and feels a personal interest in the success of free institutions will never make a dangerous voter, though he may not be able to read. The free white voters, however well they can read, who destroyed the orphan asylum in New York city, are far more dangerous to the permanency of free institutions than would be the liberty-loving colored men of this city if they should be intrusted with the ballot. And the case is quite as strong against the pardoned rebel whose hands are still red with the blood of murdered loyal soldiers, and whose heart is filled with bitterness toward the Government which has forced him to submit to its authority. While such men are allowed to vote, why should we close the doors against citizens who have always been true, and who have manifested, and still manifest, the most devoted attachment to the Government?

But, sir, these men are not all ignorant. Some of them are highly educated, while many of them are possessed of greater educational qualifications than have yet been suggested as a limitation upon the right of suffrage, and very many more come quite up to the proposed standard. And right here a few facts concerning the results the colored people of this District have accomplished relative to their property, educational, religious, and other interests, may not be unprofitable.

The number of colored inhabitants in the District, according to the census of 1860, was fourteen thousand three hundred and sixteen. This number has increased since that time, but to what extent I am not now able to state.

The value of real and personal property now owned by them is over one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The value of church property held by them is about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, consisting of twenty-one churches, which are supported at a cost of over twenty thousand dollars per annum. The number of church communicants is four thousand three hundred, while the average attendance upon religious services is nine thousand, some of these being attendants upon service at Catholic and Episcopal churches controlled by whites. The number of Sabbath schools for colored persons is twenty, attended by between three and four thousand pupils.

Of other schools for colored children there are thirty-three, and the number of pupils attending them during the month of November, 1865, was four thousand and thirty. Six of these schools are entirely supported by the colored people, others are supported by the generosity of northern benevolent societies, though the necessary books, stationery, &c., are furnished chiefly by the colored people themselves.

Four thousand of the colored population of the District can read and write. They subscribe for about four thousand five hundred copies of newspapers, a large proportion of these being dailies.

Of societies for literary, benevolent, and other purposes, they have over thirty, and through the agency of these they, to a very great extent, provide for and support the needy and infirm of their race in the District, the city government having but a very small per cent. of colored paupers to support.

This is the record of a class of citizens in this community, ninety per cent. of which were slaves or the immediate descendants of slaves, many having purchased their own freedom and that of their families.

Taken as a class the people who have accomplished these results surely show themselves possessed of enough of the heaven of thrift, education, morality, and religion to render it safe for us to make the experiment of impartial suffrage here. Let us make the trial. A failure can work no great harm; for to us belongs the power to make any change which the future may show to be necessary. How can we tell whether success or failure shall be the fruit of a practical application of the principles upon which our institutions rest unless we put them to a fair test? Give every man a fair chance to show how well he can discharge the duties of fully recognized citizenship. This is the way to solve the problem, and in no other way can it be determined. That success will attend the experiment I do not doubt. Others believe the result will prove quite the reverse. Who is right and who wrong can be ascertained only by putting the two opinions to a practical test. The passage of this bill will furnish this test, and to that end I ask for it the favorable consideration of this House.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, however atrocious some gentlemen in this House may pronounce the sentiment that this is a white man's Government, and although I have lately heard in this Hall even the spirit of the illustrious dead condemned to everlasting fire for denying while upon earth the equality of the races, I am constrained notwithstanding to assume the responsibility of a respectful but firm and earnest opposition to this bill. I am opposed to it, sir, not only upon special and local grounds, but also upon the broad general principle that this is, and of right ought to be, a white man's Government.

Sir, it is proposed by this bill to confer the elective franchise upon the colored population of the District of Columbia, and to elevate at once, without any qualification or preparation, a heterogeneous mass of about thirty thousand negroes and mulattoes to a complete political equality with the white inhabitants. It is proposed to do this, too, in opposition to the known wishes of a large majority of the citizens of the District, and in the face of an election held here only a few days ago in which the vote against negro suffrage was nearly unanimous.

In the two corporations composing the District of Columbia the vote polled stood as follows:

Washington.
Against negro suffrage.....	6,556
For negro suffrage.....	35
Total vote.....	6,591
Georgetown.
Against negro suffrage.....	712

It is in vain to say that this election was not ordered by competent authority, and ought therefore be disregarded. No matter by what authority it took place, it was the expression of popular sentiment by a vote larger than is usually polled at the ordinary municipal elections. In the city of Washington it exceeded by 871 votes the aggregate vote cast at the last election for mayor in 1864; and is in excess over the preceding vote for mayor, in 1862, as many as 1,775. It cannot therefore be said that the election was not a full expression of public opinion on the part of the voters of the city of Washington. And so unanimous was this popular verdict that the result would not be changed if you were to count against the majority all the colored inhabitants who, if the present bill were a law, would probably be entitled to a vote.

I do not dispute the power of Congress to regulate the elective franchise within the limits of the District of Columbia. But I do deny the moral right of Congress to pass this bill, opposed as it is to the will of the people, and therefore in violation of the fundamental principle of popular government. Gentlemen who represent States upon this floor profess, I presume, one and all, to represent the sentiments of their constituents in all matters which relate to the local interests of their respective districts. If it were possible for Congress to legislate in any matter touching the municipal government of their constituencies, how eloquent and earnest would they all be in opposition to any measure manifestly contrary to the expressed will of the majority represented by them in this House. But are we not also the representatives of the people of the District of Columbia? Does not the law make us the guardians of their rights as fully as if we were dependent upon their votes? In becoming their legislators, we have assumed at the same time the sacred duty of applying to them those principles of republican government which the Constitution has guaranteed to all the States. Tyrannize over them, indeed, we may, but not without the abuse of power, and a disgraceful repudiation of our moral obligations. To disregard their interests and set at naught their wishes in this matter would be especially ungracious on the part of those of us whose constituencies at home agree with the people of the District of Columbia in opposition to the principle of the pending bill. It would ill become us to fasten, by our votes, upon the people of this District, against their consent, a measure which the people of our own States have already pronounced a political degradation, and have provided against its infliction upon them by constitutional enactments. In eighteen out of twenty-five States now represented in this Congress negroes and mulattoes are not allowed to vote. In some of the others there are special restrictions imposed. In three of the States—Connecticut, Wisconsin, and Minnesota—elections were recently held, in which the people by heavy majorities decided against negro suffrage. Yet in each of these States the number of colored persons is comparatively small, while here it probably equals one third of the entire population.

In all the States the people have settled this question for themselves, and I claim the same privilege for the people of the District of Columbia.

The outrage proposed to be inflicted is considerably heightened when we consider the ignorance and degradation of the great body of those upon whom this bill would confer the elective franchise. The colored population of the District of Columbia, at the beginning of the war, was about fifteen thousand. Since then it has more than doubled, mainly by the influx of refugees and contrabands from the South, who were born and reared in slavery, and debased by all the influences of such a condition of life. Few of them able to read; without any instruction in the most elementary principles of government; living amid filth and disease; many of them subsisting upon charity—such are the beings selected by this bill to be the representatives of the American ballot-box in the political metropolis of the nation. I do not mean to say that among the colored population of the District there are not individuals of intelligence and worth who would be able to vote with judgment and patriotism; but they are the exceptions, and constitute the aristocracy, and would consider themselves debased by too close a communion with their more ignorant and degraded brethren.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] did not undertake to argue that they were fit to exercise the elective franchise, but he puts in the plea of the statute of limitations, declaring that it is too late now to exclude them from voting upon the ground of ignorance.

What have the people of the District of Columbia done to be made the victims of such a bill as this? It has been charged against them that they were disloyal, and that therefore they are to be punished with negro suffrage. "Disloyalty" is a convenient word nowadays to cover political or social persecution. I had heard that this was one of the motives of this bill, but I hardly expected to hear the gentleman from Iowa admit in his argument that that was one of the matters to be taken into consideration by this House in their votes upon this bill. I am happy, however, to have the material at hand triumphantly to defend the people of the District of Columbia from this charge brought against them by the gentleman from Iowa. The figures at the War Department refute this slander, and show a most honorable record for the people of this District in the most perilous hour of the Republic. Under the first call for seventy-five thousand men, in 1861, the District of Columbia put into the field four thousand seven hundred and twenty volunteers—six times as many as the State of Maine, or the State of New Hampshire, or the State of Vermont, and twice as many as those three States combined; about a thousand more than the State of Massachusetts, which furnished under that call three thousand seven hundred and thirty-six men. I shall not dwell upon the subsequent calls for men during the progress of the war, of whom the District of Columbia furnished her full proportion. For it was the response to the first call which was the touchstone of loyalty. Then there were neither drafts, nor bounties, nor substitutes, nor boat-loads of contrabands to be sold to the highest bidder. It was something to be loyal then in this locality, when the flag of the rebels could be seen from the dome of the Capitol, and their morning gun awoke the echoes of the presidential mansion; when even communication with the North was precarious, and at times suspended. It was something then for the District of Columbia to furnish to the Government volunteers equal to two thirds of her voting population!

But I am disposed to acquit the authors of this bill of all special malice toward the white inhabitants of the District of Columbia. I am willing to believe that it is not for the punishment of the people of this District in particular that this bill has been framed. The people of this District have no political significance. They vote only in municipal affairs, and it cannot be regarded as a matter in itself important that those affairs should be controlled by negro voters, who own comparatively so little of the property in the District, and who pay so small a portion of the taxes. The design of this bill is far more comprehensive than that. It is to inaugurate here, upon this most conspicuous stage, the first act of the new political drama which is intended to culminate in the complete political equality of the races and the establishment of negro suffrage throughout the States. Constitutional amendments with this view have been already introduced at both ends of the Capitol. The object of the leaders of this movement is no longer concealed, and if there is anything in their action to admire it is the candor, courage, and ability with which they press their cause. The agitation is to go on until the question has been settled by the country, and it may as well be met here upon the threshold. The monstrous proposition is nothing less than the absorption into the body-politic of the nation of a colored population equal to one sixth of all the inhabitants of the country, as the census reports will show. Four millions of the population so to be amalgamated have been just set free from a servitude the debasing influences of which have many a time been vividly depicted in the anti-slavery speeches of the very men who are the most prominent champions of this new political gospel. The object for which this mass of degraded humanity is to be poured into the political arteries of the nation has been boldly proclaimed. The great leader in this House of what he calls himself the "new gospel of liberty," has spoken. He has proclaimed that southern representation in Congress must be rendered powerless for any harm to that gentleman's party, either by a change in the basis of representation or by negro suffrage. In his remarkable speech he said:

"With the basis unchanged, the eighty-three southern members, with the Democrats that will in the best of times be elected from the North, will always give them a majority in Congress and in the Electoral College. They will at the very first election take possession of the White House and the Halls of Congress."

There is the point and from thence has radiated the "new gospel of liberty," demanding those measures for the establishment of negro suffrage of which this bill is one. To palliate in some degree the natural repulsiveness of the scheme, its authors attempt, and the gentleman from Iowa has but followed their example, to shoulder the responsibility upon the founders of our Republic, and they go delving down among the foundation-stones of our Government to find this stone rejected by the builders and make it the head of the corner.

Suffrage is claimed for the negro upon the ground of natural right, although the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] disclaimed on his own account putting it on that ground. He put it upon a ground which, according to his own definition, amounted to precisely the same thing. He says that although the right of suffrage is not a natural right, it is a political right, and involved in the nature of civil government. He said, moreover, that it was a right as sacred as a natural right. And therefore I do not see much difference between the ground which he takes and that which is assumed in the numerous printed pamphlets with which the desks of the members of this House are strewn.

But it seems to me that it ought to be sufficiently evident that universal suffrage is not a natural right, nor a right which is necessarily involved in the nature of civil government. On the contrary, it is a right which can only be exercised in the most artificial condition of society. Nowhere does the right of suffrage exist to the same extent as in the United States of America, and nowhere else is there, or was there ever, so complicated a system of human government. I grant that mankind are entitled by nature to as much power in the State as they are capable of understanding and of using for the general welfare. No less than that, and no more. The argument in favor of the American negro's right to vote must therefore be measured by his capacity to understand and his ability to use such right for the promotion of the public good. And that is the very matter in dispute. But the point does not turn simply upon the inferiority of the negro race. For differences without inferiority may unfit one race for political or social assimilation with another, and render their fusion in the same Government incompatible with the general welfare. It is, as I conceive, upon these principles that we must settle the question whether this is a white man's Government.

But we were told the other day by my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the committee on reconstruction, [Mr. STEVENS,] that "to say so is political blasphemy." And in support of his position he said further that "our fathers repudiated the whole doctrine of the legal superiority of races." But the truth is too plain for discussion, that our fathers recognized and practiced directly the opposite doctrine, and even fortified by the bulwarks of the Constitution itself the subjection of the inferior race. No man can read with open eyes and candid mind the Constitution of the United States, as made by our fathers, and fail to see that this Government was intended by its founders to be a white man's Government. It was on this very account that the early abolitionists denounced it as a covenant with hell, and the advocates of the higher law proposed to trample it under foot.

Arguments derived from the phraseology of the Declaration of American Independence would scarcely need a refutation, were it not for the pertinacity with which they are thrust upon us. If, however, by the expression therein contained, that "all men are created free and equal," we are to infer that the illustrious slaveholders who helped to frame that instrument intended to assert the political equality of the races, we must believe also the monstrous anomaly that they intended to proclaim their daily life a continuous lie, and their supremacy over the negro a most atrocious and wicked usurpation. If so, what blasphemy would have been their appeal to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of their intentions, and what mockery to profess as they did a decent respect for the opinions of mankind.

We find in the constitutions of many of the States the same words so much dwelt upon by the advocates of negro equality; and further on in the same constitutions we find words expressly excluding the negro from all participation in the government.

The constitution of Connecticut, adopted in 1818, says, "that all men, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights; and that no men or set of men are entitled to exclusive public emoluments or privileges in the community." But this declaration did not prevent the insertion of a clause in the same instrument confining the elective franchise to the white male citizens of the State.

Mr. Speaker, in the constitution of your own State of Indiana, adopted as late as 1851, I find these same talismanic words, "All men are created equal." But further on in the same constitution I find these other words, "No negro or mulatto shall have the right of suffrage." And in another place these additional words, "No negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in the State after the adoption of this constitution." And this last prohibition is enforced by heavy pains and penalties. Surely it will not be pretended that the intelligent people of Indiana intended to make a public proclamation of their injustice by asserting the equality of the negro, while by their organic law they denied to him all the rights of an equal, and even a home within the limits of their community.

In the constitution of the State of Oregon, adopted in 1857, there are these words: "We declare all men, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights." But in the same instrument we find also these other words, "No negro, Chinaman, or mulatto shall have the right of suffrage."

And Kansas, too, in her constitution, adopted in 1859, declares that "all men are possessed of equal and inalienable rights." But by the constitution of Kansas white male persons alone can vote.

In the constitution of the State of Iowa, adopted in 1857, are contained these words: "All men are by nature free and equal." But whether the right of suffrage should be confined to whites was submitted to a vote of the people of the State, and they decided that in that State white persons alone should vote. Yet the whole colored population of Iowa at that time did not exceed a thousand.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOYER. Certainly.

Mr. PRICE. As the gentleman quotes from the constitution of my State, and as I see that my colleague [Mr. Wilson] is not in his seat, I wish to ask the gentleman whether he does not know that in the State of Iowa, within the last few months, the question has been submitted to the people, whether or not they would strike the word "white" from their constitution, and that they have decided, by a majority of over sixteen thousand, that they would. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. BOYER. I did not know that a recent election on that subject had taken place in the State of Iowa; but the fact is immaterial so far as my argument is concerned. It does not change the principle, nor does it interfere at all with the illustration which I have drawn from the constitution of the State of Iowa. What I intended to say, and what I did say, was that the constitution of Iowa contained the declaration that "all men are, by nature, free and equal," and yet, in that same instrument, it was submitted to the people as a doubtful question of policy—not a question of principle, but a question of policy—whether the blacks should vote; and the people of Iowa decided at that time that the blacks should not vote. Whether, under the political excitement of the hour, the people of Iowa may have changed their opinion, and given a different decision within the last few months, I know not; but whether they have done so or not, I presume the fact cannot seriously affect the argument.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the discussion of this question, calls upon the stand the State of Iowa (which I in part represent on this floor) as a witness to prove the correctness of the position which he assumes, then I insist that he shall take the whole testimony of the witness or none. And, while on the floor, as I do not desire to trespass again upon the gentleman's time, I will say to him further, that it would be well for him to remember that while people and States may occasionally do wrong, it is as true to-day as it was when the sentiment was first uttered, that "the sober second thought of the people is never wrong," as has been illustrated in the recent action of my State, and this "sober second thought" is always efficient.

Mr. BOYER. I have now heard the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] and I do not see that it affects at all the validity of my argument. I shall therefore proceed in the presentation of the line of thought on which I was engaged when I yielded to the gentleman.

The constitutions of other States contain similar general declarations of principle, while they extend the elective franchise to white men only. But it is needless to multiply examples, if it be not already sufficiently plain that neither the past nor present generations of our countrymen, in their declarations of the equality of men, intended to apply it to the political amalgamation of the races.

All men have indeed in some sense been created equal; but to apply this in its broadest signification, so as to ignore all national and ethnological inequalities among men, would involve the grossest absurdity. All men were endowed by their Creator with the equal right to receive, to do, and to enjoy according to their several capacities and in subservience to the common good: All men are equally entitled by nature to the enjoyment of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," but it does not follow from this that different races of men can all enjoy these blessings together in the same community and in the same form of government upon terms of complete equality. If it be true, as is affirmed by the greatest of the Apostles, that "God hath made of one blood all the nations of men," the same high authority informs us also that "he hath determined the bounds of their habitation." There is one extensive region of the earth where, all things considered, the negro is the superior of the white man, and where his race, defended by natural laws, has successfully defied the invading legions of conquering Rome and all the efforts of European enterprise. In Ethiopia the negro is and must ever continue to be the ruling race. But laws of Providence as imperative as those which have set apart Ethiopia for him will in the end preserve this Government for white men and their posterity, notwithstanding all the morbid excitements of this hour and all the temporary evils to which they are likely to lead. The ordinances of nature are not to be repealed by acts of Congress.

Of the same nature as the argument just answered is the one derived from that clause in the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to all the States a republican form of government. Strangely enough, it is insisted that to make a State republican in form its negro population must vote. But of this principle the founders of our Republic must surely have lived and died in blissful ignorance, for they certainly acted and talked as if they imagined they were living in republican communities, even when surrounded by negro slaves. If the negro has a natural right to vote because he is a human inhabitant of a community professing to be republican, then women should vote, for the same reason; and the New England States themselves are only pretended republics, because their women, who are in a considerable majority, are denied the right of suffrage.

Some of the reformers do say that after the negro will come the women. But I protest against this inverse order of merit; and if both are to vote I claim precedence for the ladies. There is one sense in which I will admit that negro votes will be needed at the South to make Republican States. And that is the sense in which the term "Republican" was used by my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] in his speech already referred to, when, with even more than his characteristic candor, he assigned a reason for the coercion of southern communities into the adoption of negro suffrage. Said he:

"If they should grant the right of suffrage to persons of color, I think there would always be Union white men enough in the South aided by the blacks to divide the representation, and thus continue the Republican ascendancy."

But I deny that to be the precise form of republican government guaranteed by the Constitution.

It is common for the advocates of negro suffrage to assume that the color of the negro is the main obstacle to his admission to political equality; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] dwelt long upon that argument. But it is not the complexion of the negro that degrades him, and I grant that it is but a shallow argument that goes no deeper than his skin. If he is to be excluded from equality in the Government it is not because he is black, nor because he has long heels and woolly hair, nor because the bones of his cranium are thick and enclose a brain averaging by measurement fewer cubic inches in volume than the skulls of white Americans, (although that fact is significant,) nor because of his odor, (although that is not always agreeable,) nor because his facial outline does not conform to our ideas of beautiful humanity. All these considerations I am willing to discard from the argument. But if the peculiarities I have mentioned are the outward badges of a race by nature inferior in mental caliber, and lacking that vim, pluck, and poise of character which give force and direction to human enterprise, and which are essential to the safety and progress of popular institutions, then the negroes are not the equals of white Americans, and are not entitled by any right, natural or acquired, to participate in the Government of this country.

The negro has no history of civilization. From the earliest ages of recorded time he has ever been a savage or a slave. He has populated with teeming millions the vast extent of a continent, but in no portion of it has he ever emerged from barbarism, and in no age or country has he ever established any other stable government than a despotism. But he is the most obedient and happy of slaves. His true character is well depicted in the late inaugural address of Governor Walker, of Florida.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that he should always be kept in slavery because he was contented in that condition. I do not wish it to be understood that I do not rejoice in his freedom; but I speak of the contentment which he manifested in that condition as one badge of the inferiority of his race.

Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, regarding the negroes uses the following language:

"For generations past they have been our faithful, contented, and happy slaves. They have been attached to our persons and our fortunes, sharing with us all our feelings—rejoicing with us in our prosperity, mourning with us in our adversity. If there were exceptions to this general rule, they were only individual exceptions. Every southern man who hears me knows that what I say is literally true in regard to the vast mass of our colored population. The world has never before seen such a body of slaves. For not only in peace but in war they have been faithful to us."

During much of the time of the late unhappy difficulties, Florida had a greater number of men in the army, beyond her limits, than constituted her entire voting population. This, of course, stripped many districts of their entire arms-bearing inhabitants, and left our females and infant children almost exclusively to the protection of our slaves. They proved true to their trust. Not one instance of insult, outrage, or indignity has ever come to my knowledge. They remained at home and made provisions for our army. Many of them went with our sons to the army, and there, too, proved their fidelity, attending them when well, nursing and caring for them when sick and wounded. We all know that many of them were willing, and some of them anxious, to take up arms in our cause. Although for several years within sound of the guns of the vessels of the United States, for six hundred miles along our sea-board, yet scarcely one in a thousand voluntarily left our agricultural service to take shelter and freedom under the flag of the Union. It is not their fault that they are free—they had nothing to do with it: that was brought about by the results and operations of the war."

What is here said by Governor Walker of the character of the negroes in Florida may be said with truth of the negroes throughout the confederate States. It exhibits a touching example of the devotion of an affectionate, patient, forgiving, and inferior race of men. But the race from which sprang these four million contented slaves is not the stuff of which great commonwealths are made. Who of us would not rather welcome to our shores that rude population of less than half a million Circassians who in their mountain fastnesses for more than thirty years defied the whole power of the Russian empire? Such is the difference in the breed of men—a difference which all your schools and colleges cannot do away.

Of all men, the negroes themselves are best contented with their situation. They are not the prime movers in the agitations which concern them. An examination of the tables of the last census will demonstrate that they do not attach much importance to political rights. It will be found that the free people of color are most numerous in some of those States which accord them the fewest political privileges; and in those States which have granted them the right of suffrage they seem to see but few attractions. In Maryland there were in 1860, 83,942 free people of color; in Pennsylvania 56,949; in Ohio 36,673. In neither of those States were they voters. In the State of New York, where they could not vote except under a property qualification which excluded the most of them, they numbered 49,005. But in Massachusetts, where they did then and do now vote, there were but 9,602. And in all New England (except Connecticut, where they are not allowed to vote) there were at the last census but 16,084. If the American negro in his desire and capacity for self-government bore any resemblance to the Caucasian he would distinguish himself by emigration; and, spurning the soil which had enslaved his race, he would seek equality and independence in a more congenial clime. But the spirit of independence and hardy manhood which brought the Puritans to the shores of a New England wilderness he lacks. He will not even go to Massachusetts now, although instead of a stormy ocean his barrier is only an imaginary State line, and instead of a howling wilderness he is invited to a land resounding with the myriad voices of the industrial arts, and instead of painted savages with uplifted tomahawks he has reason to expect a crowd of male and female philanthropists, with beaming faces and outstretched hands, to welcome him and call him brother. There will he find lecturers to prove his equality, and statesmen to claim him as an associate ruler in the land. If he cares for these things, or is fit for them, why does he linger outside upon the very borders of his political Eden? Why does he not enter into it—avoiding Connecticut in his route—and take possession? The fact is that the fine political theories set up in his behalf are not in accordance with the natural instinct of the negro, which in this particular is truer than the philosophy of his white advisers.

They are but superficial thinkers who imagine that the organic differences of races can be obliterated by the education of the schools. The qualities of races are perpetuated by descent, and are the result of historical influences reaching far back into the generations of the past. An educated negro is a negro still: The cunning chisel of a Canova could not make an enduring Corinthian column out of a block of anthracite; not because of its color, but on account of the structure of its substance. He might indeed with infinite pains give it the form, but he could not impart to it the strength and adhesion of particles required to enable it to brave the elements, and the temple it was made to support would soon crumble into ruin.

The types of races are transmitted to their Governments. When or where did either the Mongolian, Malay, or African race, or indeed any other race than the Caucasian, ever establish any stable Government based upon the principles of constitutional liberty? How many centuries of historical training did it not require to educate even a portion of that most progressive of races up to the capacity of self-government!

Through what dark vicissitudes and bloody revolutions did they not pursue in vain the fleeting vision of democracy! Here at last, in the United States of America, for the first time in the history of the world, are associated the real existence of democratic institutions with the dominion of a mighty empire. It is certainly our duty to promote the interests and protect the rights of all within our borders. But to be successful this Government must be conducted and perpetuated by the race that made it. The streams of European immigration which have set with such a ceaseless current upon our shores have invigorated us with copious infusions of Caucasian blood, each converging current laden with its own peculiar wealth. The sturdy independence of the Englishman, the stability and thrift of the German, the generous enthusiasm of the Irishman, were all welcome because they were all ennobling. But what are we to gain from the negro? And why will gentlemen persist, for the sake of mere party considerations, in forcing his race into unnatural alliances with ours? There is no political alchemy by which two races, representing as these do the opposite extremes of humanity, can be made to unite. Like oil and water, which have no chemical affinity for each other, you may mix their particles by agitation, but when left alone they will subside into separate strata, the one above and the other below. The history of all mongrel races associated in the government of a country has been disastrous. Of this, Mexico, Hayti, and Jamaica are all examples.

It is claimed that as a reward for the services of the negroes in our Army the right of suffrage should be conferred upon their race. I am not disposed to disparage the military services of the negroes. They fought creditably, as all men will fight when well led. And their race has been rewarded with emancipation. But the argument for negro suffrage, on the score of military service, begs the whole question of their fitness. If on account of incapacity or unavoidable differences they were not fit to be electors before the war, the same reasons for their exclusion still exist; and if no such incapacity or differences exist, or they are entitled by any natural right to vote, they should vote whether they fought or not. The fact is that, as a race, they did far more to sustain the rebellion than to suppress it. By their patient labor they sustained and fed the armies of the rebellion. They rose nowhere in insurrection, and it can scarcely be said that of their own accord they struck one blow for their own emancipation.

It is argued that suffrage is necessary to the black man to enable him to protect himself against the oppression of the whites. But I do not think that this has been the experience of the country. In Pennsylvania we had, at the date of the last census, a colored population of 56,949, which since then has largely increased. They are there excluded from the polls; but in all my experience in the courts of my State, which has not been inconsiderable, I cannot recall to mind a single instance where justice was denied to a negro because of his complexion. I am satisfied that in those localities where such prejudice is allowed to corrupt the streams of justice you would only add force and acrimony to its operation by establishing a political rivalry between the races. The true friends of the negro race should save them from the fate which would be sure to follow. There is much to be done for the negro in which all parties can unite. In his emancipation the whole country has acquiesced, and a constitutional amendment enables Congress to secure to him the full measure of his liberty in all the States. It is our duty now to provide for his education, and to encourage and aid him in his efforts at improvement. Let the courts be opened to him; let his contracts be enforced, his labor protected, and his rights of property respected. Let public schools be provided for him; and after he shall have been first developed to the full measure of his intellectual and moral capacity there will be still time enough to decide the question whether he shall be a ruler in the land.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman to suspend a moment for the purpose of submitting a motion to amend.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend is not in order pending the motion to recommit.

Mr. HALE. My motion is to amend the motion to recommit by adding instructions.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is in order.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] by adding to that motion an instruction to the committee to amend the bill so as to extend the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia to all persons coming within either of the following classes, irrespective of caste or color, but subject only to existing provisions and qualifications other than those founded on caste or color, to wit:

1. Those who can read the Constitution of the United States;

2. Those who are assessed for and pay taxes on real or personal property within the District;

3. Those who have served in and been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States;

And to restrict such right of suffrage to the classes above named, and to include proper provisions excluding from the right of suffrage those who have borne arms against the United States during the late rebellion, or given aid and comfort to said rebellion.

The question then being upon the amendment offered by Mr. HALE,

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the colored population of the United States is now about five millions. That is nearly double the population of all New England, fully one seventh of the entire population of the United States, and almost double the number that carried this country through a seven years' war with the greatest military Power in the world.

What shall be done with these five million people? Colonize them? Where and when? To Africa? Liberia is the most desirable and accessible part of that country, but that colony is now more than forty years old, and its emigrant population is only seven or eight thousand. Some ten thousand, in all, have been taken there, but from twenty to thirty per cent. of that number died during the period of acclimation. To land five million men, women, and children upon this miasmatic coast, without houses, roads or improved lands would be murder by the million. The original kidnapping and importation of slaves to this country was a very merciful and Christian business compared with such an exodus as this. But if we were wicked enough to embark in such a cruel enterprise we could not accomplish it. Calculate the expense, to say nothing of suffering, of collecting the entire population of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois and taking them to the Atlantic coast; compute the expense of transportation for such a nation across the Atlantic, and to these sums add the cost of houses, roads, clearings, stock, and temporary maintenance in that unhealthy climate, and you will have a bill too great for the resources of the country, even if we were not in debt. But to gather up and colonize the scattered and unwilling colored population, almost equal in numbers, would be a much greater undertaking.

Colonize them in Mexico, then, it is said. The expense might be a few million less, but still far beyond the present resources and strained credit of the Government. Other obstacles would intervene. Mexico has eight million five hundred thousand of population now. Where could you thrust five million more in that uninviting land of endless war? Beside, if this vast population is as undesirable as is represented, they would be nearly as offensive to the people of Mexico as it is said they ought to be to us, and our unchristian purpose would be defeated by the kindred prejudices of that nation. Colonize them, then, in some of our western Territories! The expense and injustice of this undertaking would be considerably less, but it would be just no colonization at all. They would soon be surrounded by our advancing millions, and left in the very heart of the country from which you desire to expel them.

The whole scheme of colonization is so far beyond the present ability of the Government, so destructive to the productive interest of the country, so inhuman and unjust toward the people whose unpaid labor has added so much to the wealth and comfort of the nation, and whose valor and patriotism has helped to sustain it in its late life-struggle, and so impracticable and impossible, even if it was right, that its advocates can scarcely expect to be credited with sense and sincerity at the same time. The thoughtless may be sincere, but the knowing ones can only design to distract the attention of the people from the consideration of other propositions and necessities. And if colonization were practicable what would become of the old theory urged by pro-slavery divines and politicians who are for the most part the present advocates of colonization, that white men could not labor in the warm latitudes of the South? Do they propose now, in sending off the only possible laborers there, according to their theory, to abandon the culture of the South altogether? or do they confess they were only trying to cheat the people into the support of a cruel institution by false logic then, as they are trying to delude them with false theories now? If you mean to try colonization why not begin it at once? The longer you delay the more numerous will be these people and the more determined to stay. Bring in your bill and let us see the details. How many billions of new bonds must be put upon the market, how large an army will be asked, how many ships will be needed, and how many years will it take to effect the expulsion? What, in the meanwhile, is the world to do for cotton? What shall be done with the unwilling and the fugitives? Will you hunt them with bloodhounds, or procure the services of Buchanan's old marshals? Give us at once your bill of particulars.

If colonization is found impracticable, will you try to reënslave them? I suppose not. The blacks are now too intelligent, too self-reliant, and too spirited to submit again to the oppressor. It is feared by some that the northern wing of the Democratic party will again yield its neck, not yet quite free from the old callous, to the yoke of the southern master; but the negro never will. Besides, the great Republican party, strong in numbers but stronger in its convictions of right, will always stand between the weak and oppression. I know it is said that that party may become powerless by the defection of the President. It is alleged by the Opposition, and feared even by some of our friends, that when the grim leaders of the rebellion shall reëmbbrace their old party allies, a President placed in power by Republican trust and Republican votes, forgetful of an example that consigned two Presidents to private life and public infamy, will be present to celebrate the reunion of these pardoned principals in crime with suspected accessories before the fact. I do not speculate as to what the President may do. You never know what a single man, suddenly elevated to power, may do. "Put not your trust in princes" is a warning that will apply to all men in power. I never could guess the secret motives that induced Tyler and Fillmore to betray the Whigs. I have often heard that a person who stands on the brink of Niagara, or climbs to the top of a lofty tower, feels an almost irresistible impulse to jump off. It may be some such unnatural sensation that prompted these two gentlemen to leap from their high eminence into the terrible obscurity below. I cannot believe that Mr. Johnson will follow these unseductive examples. But if he should, he alone will be broken. The tower will stand, but his crippled limbs can never again ascend it. The ranks of the Republican army would not even waver. Its contractors and sutlers would fly, to be sure; but without the loss of a man or a gun, it would still stand, the friend of the oppressed and the terror of the oppressor. Whatever individuals may do, be assured the Republican party will adhere to its principles, and in its principles will certainly triumph. The Whig party could hardly be said ever to have been in a settled majority of the people, and yet it stood the betrayal of two of its Presidents, and only broke down when it surrendered to the slave power in the Baltimore convention of 1852.

I conclude, therefore, that colonization and reënslavement are both impossible. "Then extermination awaits them," so we are told. The census, however, tells a different story. These tables show that the black population multiply quite as fast as the white. It is the large additions of the white element from abroad that gives that race an apparent advantage. I know that these people are poor. For long, dark years their industry has gone to swell the overgrown estates of their present persecutors. They have been accustomed to a life of deprivation. Their wants are few; and in a country where labor is high and land and food are cheap they cannot waste away. I know it is thought that this rapid increase is due to the mercenary care of the master. The more children he could raise for the market the greater his estate. This is true only of a few of the more northern States. Breeding was not encouraged in the planting States further south. The overseer's task was inconsistent with the duties of maternity. The services of the mother were worth more than her offspring. The life of the slave was graduated by the price of cotton, and, as a general rule, it would pay to use him up in seven years. And whatever would pay in that country was practiced. Humanity was no restraint, for making a man into a brute makes the maker brutal. During the transition from bondage to freedom, in the midst of civil war and bitter persecution, their numbers may possibly diminish for a short time; but the expectation that they will become extinct has no foundation either in the history or characteristics of the race.

In endeavoring to look fairly at this question, I have found no evidence upon which to rest the belief that this race is ever to be colonized, reënslaved, or exterminated. I come back, then, to the question with which I began, what shall be done with them?

"Let them alone." That is the answer given by a member of the New York Legislature when it was proposed to send surgeons to vaccinate the Indians who were dying of small-pox on the Reserve. "They are a drunken, vagrant, thieving race," said he; "let them alone. The sooner they are gone the better for the country." "We cannot afford to let them alone," said the member in reply; "they spread the infection through the whole surrounding country, and we have only the choice to administer relief or suffer and die with them." Neither can we afford to let five millions of population, who are forever to remain in our midst, increasing as we increase, sink down into hopeless ignorance, degradation, and vice. If we do, our own race will certainly grade down to them. The more we degrade these people the lower we sink ourselves. The ignorant white people have been made to believe that the elevation of the negro is equivalent to their debasement. The reverse is true. The more we improve this unfortunate race, the higher we raise our own. Human influence is not confined by a sharp embankment of rank or condition. It overflows to adjacent ranks, corrupting or purifying them as it is itself corrupt or pure. All classes in society are elevated where there is no degraded class. It is the interest, therefore, of every white man that these people should be educated in morals, skill, industry, and letters. Every dollar expended for this purpose will economize losses by unskilled labor, by riots, theft, and poor rates more than tenfold. I am not now advocating the cause of this race, however meritorious it may be. I do not base the necessity of their improvement upon any claim of their own. It does not at all impair my argument to concede the truth of all the charges preferred against them, even by their most unscrupulous accusers. Suppose that their minds are as weak, and their proclivities to vagrancy and vice as strong, as the life-long despoilers of their earnings allege, (admitting at the same time my premises that they cannot be sent abroad, nor reënslaved nor exterminated at home,) it only makes the necessity founded in self-interest the more imperative upon us in every possible way to encourage their improvement.

I submit to the House that the cheapest elevator and best moralizer for an oppressed and degraded class is to inspire them with self-respect, with belief in the possibility of their elevation. Bestow the elective franchise upon the colored population of this District, and you awaken the hope and ambition of the whole race throughout the country. Hitherto punishment has been the only incentive to sobriety and industry furnished these people by American law. They were kept too low to feel disgrace, and reward was inconsistent with the theory of "service owed." Let us try now the persuasive power of wages and protection. If colored suffrage is still considered an experiment, this District is a good place in which to try it. The same objections do not exist here that are urged on behalf of some of the States. No constitutional question intervenes. Here, at least, Congress is supreme. The law can be passed, and if it is found to be bad a majority can repeal it. The colored race is too small in numbers here to endanger the supremacy of the white people, but large and loyal enough to counteract to some extent disloyal proclivities.

Why, then, should they not vote?

Because, say the Opposition, that is negro equality! Equality in what? In mind, stature, education, morals, or wealth? If these much-coveted qualities can be so easily bestowed, is any man mean enough to withhold them? The objection is contradictory. First, he shall not vote because he is the white man's inferior; and second, because it will make him an equal. Do you mean by equality personal friendship and social intercourse? Why, sir, if there is anything free in this country, or in any country, it is the right of each man to select his own associates. Companionship is free now, and will be then. It is your constitutional right to associate with men of color now, if you are so inclined, while you are not forced to associate with nor even speak to a white voter now, nor will you be with a black voter in the future. On the other hand, it is the constitutional right of the colored man to shun you now, and his right would neither be enlarged nor diminished by his enfranchisement. The equality so much dreaded and so fiercely denounced must mean, if it means anything, that a colored man's vote will count one toward the election of mayor and councils for Washington city, and a white man's vote will count one also, and no more. That is all. And why should they not be so counted? What do the mayor and councils have to do that none but the aristocracy can judge of their fitness? Simply to mend the roads, look after the poor, and take care of the schools. Certainly these are subjects of deep interest to men of color as well as white men, and not above the capacity of the lowest. Colored men do the work on the streets; they ought to understand what repairs are needed as well as how to make them. You say they are poor; they ought to know the poor man's wants. You say they are ignorant; then give them a chance to vote against a mayor who loads them with school tax and deprives them of schools. In this District no vote is cast for President, member of Congress, judge of the courts, nor any officer except the administrators of local affairs, in which all citizens, however ignorant in national matters, are necessarily well informed. This action is not altogether an experiment. In Boston the colored people vote, and it is the best-governed city in the United States. But if it is to be considered an experiment altogether, then, as I said before, there is no better place in the whole country in which to try it than the District of Columbia.

Again, it is said it will lead to amalgamation. This cry has been too often raised to alarm even the most ignorant. When the Democratic party endeavored to establish slavery in the territory acquired from Mexico, the arguments in opposition were met by the cry of "amalgamation." Negro equality was their covering cry, during their long struggle, through fraud and violence to force slavery on the unwilling people of Kansas. When slavery was abolished in the District of Columbia, "Amalgamation and negro equality" was followed by that party all over the land. When the great and good President issued his proclamation of emancipation, they again screamed "Amalgamation and negro equality;" and the cry came still again in terrible shrieks when slavery was forever prohibited by amendment of the Constitution. This is a standing argument with the Opposition, and is brought out on all occasions when any legislation is proposed touching the interest of the colored population. Even on so trifling an occasion as the passage of a law at the last session allowing these people to ride in the street cars of this city, a cry of horror was sent over the country that I thought would startle the whole Anglo-Saxon race to its feet in defense of its blood; but I soon saw that nobody was scared, and we all now see that nobody was hurt. Let our sensitive friends compose their nerves and try to tell us how a little enlargement of the elective franchise, over small and purely local matters in this District, will result in marriage between the two races. It is fright that makes you mistake a ballot for a billet-doux. It cannot be possible that any man of common sense can bring himself to believe that marriages between any persons, much less between white and colored people, will take place because a colored man is allowed to drop a little bit of paper in a box, thereby intimating who he considers the fittest person to be mayor of this city. It is too trifling for argument.

We are again told that their average ability is below that of the white race. How do you know that? The colored man has never exhibited equal ability, to be sure, but he has never had equal opportunities. The forbidding statutes of the South attest the capacity of the negro. If they really believed his mind was so feeble, why bind it with such heavy chains? If he was incapable of learning, why prohibit it with the penitentiary? Their theories proved he was weak, but their legislation acknowledged he was strong. They debased him by law to fit him for slavery, and justified slavery because he was debased. So in this District the withholding opportunities of improvement is justified on the ground of his inferiority, and his inferiority is shown by his lack of improvement. But suppose the white race is superior, does it follow that the inferior race should be deprived of any authoritative mode of making its wants known to the Government? If mind is to be made the test of suffrage, a great many noisy declaimers against the negro will lose their votes. As a general rule, the men least fitted to vote are the warmest advocates of exclusion. They apprehend, with much reason, that they may be distanced in the race if the black man is not forced to carry weight. Such men should beware how they advocate a theory that would jeopardize their own votes if made universal. But it is further said that whatever their capacity, they are at least uneducated now. That would be but a short-lived objection if true, and not solely applicable to people of color. But it is not true of the largest portion of the colored people in this District. Nearly all of them can read, and the scholarship of many is of a very high order. The whole objection is easily obviated by an educational qualification.

Another objection, very much relied upon, is that a majority of the white population here are opposed to it. A prominent man charged with a high crime in Pennsylvania alleged that the hostility and prejudice of the people in the county where he was indicted would deprive him of a fair trial, and asked the Legislature to grant him a change of venue. The people of that county remonstrated, and submitted to the Legislature that they were the fittest persons to try him, because they knew he was guilty. If the people here were generally consenting to this enlargement of the franchise its necessity would be less apparent. It is because the negro is hated in this city, and justice denied him by prejudiced officials, that his vote is necessary for his own protection. Every vote against him at this pretended election was an argument in his favor. I know that the prejudices, erroneous sentiments, and even vices of the people should be somewhat regarded in legislation, and that vested wrongs supposed to be vested rights should be divested very slowly. But what less can we do in this direction than is proposed to be done by this bill, namely, to bestow the elective franchise upon a handful of men, who, as a body, are intelligent, sober, peaceable, and industrious, and in a District where only local officers are chosen, and over which our right to legislate cannot be questioned. It must be opposed, not upon the ground that it is going too fast or granting too much at first, but upon the ground that, in that direction no step should be taken—nothing granted now, nor forever; that this is exclusively a white man's Government and the colored man is his slave. This is a rebel heresy entirely exploded by the war. We are coming back to the doctrine of our fathers. In the Continental Congress they asserted that "all men are created free and equal." They subsequently made the Constitution to accord with this sentiment, and for forty years, and as long as they lived to administer it, negroes were allowed to vote in all the old States except, perhaps, South Carolina. Both the precept and practice of our fathers refute the allegation that this is exclusively a white man's Government. If we cannot now consent to so slight a recognition, as proposed by this bill, of the great underlying theory of our Government, as declared and practiced by our fathers, we are thrown back upon that new and monstrous doctrine that the five millions of our colored population and their posterity forever have no rights that a white man is bound to respect.

Who pronounces this crushing sentence? The political South; and what is this South? The southern master and his northern minion. Have these people wronged the South? Have they filled it with violence, outrage, and murder? No, sir, they are remarkably gentle, patient, and respectful. Have they despoiled its wealth or diminished its grandeur? No, sir, their unpaid toil has made the material South. They removed the forests, cleared the fields, built the dwellings, churches, colleges, cities, highways, railroads, and canals. Why, then, does the South hate and persecute these people? Because it has wronged them. Injustice always hates its victim. They are forced to look to the North for justice. And what is the North? Not the latitude of frosts; not New England and the States that border on the lakes, the Mississippi, and the Pacific. The geographical is lost in the political meaning of the word. The North, in a political sense, means justice, liberty, and union, and in the order in which I name them. Jefferson defined this "North" when he wrote "all men are created equal, endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This North has no geographical boundaries. It embraces the friends of freedom in every quarter of this great Republic. Many of its bravest champions, like our still unstolen Republican President, hail from the geographical South. The North, that did not fear the slave power in its prime, in the day of its political strength and patronage, when it commanded alike the nation and the mob, and for the same cruel purpose, will not be intimidated by its expiring maledictions around this capital. The North must pass this bill, to vindicate its sincerity and its courage. The slave power has already learned that the North is terrible in war and forgiving and gentle in peace; let its crushed and mangled victims learn from the passage of this bill that the justice of the North, unlimited by lines of latitude, unlimited by color or race, slumbereth not.

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. If my colleague will yield to me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. KELLEY. I would be obliged if the gentleman would permit me to go on this afternoon.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, certainly; I thought the gentleman would prefer an adjournment.

Mr. KELLEY. What I have to say is unwritten, and I prefer to go on while the glow is on me. Mr. Speaker, in asking the consideration of the House to the bill now before it, I was actuated by no temporary impulse, no gust of passion. I did it in view of the responsibility that rests upon this Congress, and in view of the gravity of the questions which mark the era in which we live.

In preparing to begin the work of reconstructing the grandest of human Governments, shattered for a time by treason, and in endeavoring to ascertain what we should do and how and when it should be done, I have consulted no popular impulse. Groping my way through the murky political atmosphere that has prevailed for more than thirty years, I have seated myself at the feet of the fathers of our country that I might as far as my suggestions would go make them in accordance with the principles of those who constructed our Government. I can make no suggestion for the improvement of the primary principles or general structure of our Government, and I would heal its wounds so carefully that it should descend to posterity unstained and unmarred as it came, under the guidance of Providence, from the hands of those who fashioned it. Sir, let us ascertain, if we can, whether they have furnished us guides for this trying hour. I am denounced as a radical. Thank God! the term is coming to be honorable. Men know that he only is a radical who stands by the eternal principles which God ordained, and one such, having the Almighty with him, is ever in the majority. I come to my duty, however, with Washington and Madison to guide me, and I find that the term "radical" did not frighten them.

In the first volume of the Madison Papers, page 287, I find a letter from Madison, written at New York, April 16, 1787, to General Washington. Mark the date and consider the duty in which Madison and Washington were then engaged, or about to engage. No other era in American history is so analogous to this of ours as that was. Ours is, as I have said, the work of reconstruction. They were contemplating or engaged in the work of construction. The Confederacy had failed, fallen to pieces, was almost as dead as the late confederacy of the southern States. The Union did not yet exist; it had to be created. The principles that guided those to whom that great work was confided we may safely adopt. "Dear sir," said James Madison to Washington,

"I have been honored with your letter of the 31st March, and find, with much pleasure, that your views of the reform, which ought to be pursued by the Convention, give a sanction to those I entertained. Temporizing applications will dishonor the councils which propose them, and may foment the internal malignity of the disease, at the same time that they produce an ostensible palliation of it. Radical attempts, although unsuccessful, will at least justify the authors of them."

I turn now to the Federalist, No. 39, to a paper also from the pen of James Madison, examining "the conformity of the plan of Government to republican principles," in which he says:

"The first question that offers itself is, whether the general form and aspect of the Government be strictly republican? It is evident that no other form would be reconcilable with the genius of the people of America; with the fundamental principles of the Revolution; or with that honorable determination which animates every votary of freedom, to rest all our political experiments on the capacity of mankind for self-government. If the plan of the Convention, therefore, be found to depart from the republican character, its advocates must abandon it as no longer defensible."

"It is essential to such a Government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion, or a favored class of it; otherwise a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans, and claim for their Government the honorable title of republic."

He does not seem to have agreed with my distinguished colleague from the sixth district, [Mr. BOYER,] that poverty is a cause of exclusion from the ballot-box.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman give way for a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BOYER. Did the gentleman understand me as saying that?

Mr. KELLEY. I certainly understood the gentleman to say that the people to whom we propose to extend the right of suffrage were ignorant and poor, nigh unto pauperism, and to urge that as a reason for withholding from them the power to defend those rights which God gives to every man though he own nothing but his skill and honest will to labor.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman give way to me for a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. I did not use the words that the gentleman attributes to me at all at any time in the course of my speech.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague repeat the language he did use?

Mr. BOYER. I only described as I understand it and believe it exists, the situation of the population which this bill proposes to make electors here in the metropolis of the nation. I did not urge in any part of my argument that because they were poor, therefore they should be excluded from the right of suffrage, but because they were ignorant, and in other respects unfit to exercise the elective franchise.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to do me the honor to read that portion of his speech to the House, that it may be incorporated in mine.

Mr. BOYER. I should be very glad to do so if I had it. If the reporters will allow me to have the copy, I will read it with pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. Or if it will better please the gentleman I will incorporate it in my remarks as the reporters shall hand them to me.

Mr. BOYER. I hope the gentleman will do so.

Mr. KELLEY. Leaving what the gentleman did say to the memory of the House, I pass on to see what were Madison's views on that subject.

In a paper entitled "Notes on Suffrage," No. 2, beginning on page 21 of volume four of the Madison Papers, he discusses the just limitations of suffrage with reference to the security of the State the extent of empire and future population of which was not only unknown but, as history attests, then unimagined. He discussed how far property should have its voice in elections, and how far the majority of the people, who would never acquire property, should have their rights; and having weighed and considered all the suggested devices for securing property on the one hand against possible agrarianism, and to secure on the other hand personal liberty against all assaults, thus announced his conclusion:

"Under every view of the subject it seems indispensable that the mass of the citizens should not be without a voice in making the laws which they are to obey, and in choosing the magistrates who are to administer them. And if the only alternative be between an equal and universal right of suffrage for each branch of the Government, and a confinement of the entire right to a part of the citizens, it is better that those having the greater interest at stake, namely, that of property and persons both, should be deprived of half their share in the Government; than that those having a lesser interest, that of personal rights only, should be deprived of the whole."

With Madison, as with all the leaders of the Democratic party before it had adopted as its entire creed devotion to a trinity of objects—secession, slavery, and free trade—the doctrine was that Government should rest on the consent of the governed, and that its only legitimate object was the protection of the rights of the governed.

Mr. BOYER. If my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] will allow me, I will state that the reporters have furnished me with that portion of my speech which he has promised to incorporate into his own, and I hope he will do so. I read as follows:

"The outrage proposed to be inflicted is considerably heightened when we consider the ignorance and degradation of the great body of those upon whom this bill would confer the elective franchise. The colored population of the District of Columbia, at the beginning of the war, was about fifteen thousand. Since then it has been more than doubled, mainly by the influx of refugees and contrabands from the South, who were born and reared in slavery, and debased by all the influences of such a condition of life; few of them able to read; without any instruction in the most elementary principles of government; living amid filth and disease—many of them subsisting on charity—such are the beings selected by this bill to be the representatives of the American ballot-box in the political metropolis of the nation."

Now the gentleman has my whole description, and he may make the most of it.

Mr. KELLEY. I am very much obliged to my colleague, and I now arraign him with having, in the hope of depriving the poor of political power for the protection of their rights, surrounded the proposition before the House with conditions and circumstances extraneous to it, and so presented a picture which has not suggested itself to the mind of any calm man who has read the bill and knows to whom the right of suffrage is proposed to be given by it. It proposes to give it to the "citizens of the District," and the gentleman knows as well as I do that the mass of people who are poor by reason of his oppression, and whom he has described, are no part of the citizens or resident population of the District. If they become such, they will, as I shall show you, even under the infamous oppressions heaped upon the colored people of the District by the oligarchy that rules it, ay, even in that case, by the time they become voters, have an opportunity of learning to read the English language as well as it is read by thousands of the people who make the Democratic majority in the city of New York.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman to excuse me. I must apply to him the rule which he invariably applies to me, which is to say "no," when I ask leave to interrupt him for explanation, or propose to correct his casual misstatements.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman is afraid to meet the issue.

Several MEMBERS. "Order!" "Order!"

Mr. KELLEY. For whom do we ask this legislation? In 1860, according to the census, there were fourteen thousand three hundred and sixteen colored people in this District, and we ask this legislation for the male adults of that number. Are they in rags and filth and degradation? The tax books of the District will tell you that they pay taxes on $1,250,000 worth of real estate, held within the limits of this District. On one block, on which they pay taxes on fifty odd thousand dollars, there are but two colored freeholders who have not bought themselves out of slavery. One of them has bought as many as eight persons beside himself, a wife and seven children. Coming to freedom in manhood, mortgaged for a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars as his own price, he has earned and carried to the southern robber thousands of dollars, the price extorted for his wife and children, and is now a freeholder in this District. They have twenty-one churches, which they own, and which they maintain at an annual cost of over twenty thousand dollars. Their communing members number over forty-three hundred. In their twenty-two Sunday-schools they gather on each Sabbath over three thousand American children of African descent. They maintain, sir, to the infamous disgrace of the American Congress and people, thirty-three day schools, eight of which are maintained exclusively by contributions from colored citizens of the District; the remainder by their contributions, eked out by contributions from the generous people of the North; and every dollar of their million and a quarter dollars of real estate and personal property is taxed for schools to educate the children of the white people of the District, the fathers of many of those children having been absent during the war fighting for the confederacy and against our Constitution and flag. Who shall reproach them with being poor and ignorant, while Congress, which has exclusive jurisdiction over the District, has till last year robbed them day by day, and barred the door of the public school against them? Such reproach does not lie in the white man's mouth; at any rate, no member of the Democratic party ought to utter it. They take in, as the subscription lists of the two papers show, more than twelve hundred copies each afternoon of the National Republican, and over thirty-five hundred copies each morning of the Daily Chronicle.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg leave to remind the gentleman that it was stated some time ago that nobody in Washington is "respectable," unless he takes the National Intelligencer. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I am not pleading for the "respectable," which Carlyle says means in England "those who keep a gig;" it is for the poor and lowly I plead. But I would thank God if my Democratic fellow-citizens of the sixth district of Pennsylvania would to the same proportion read two papers as valuable, as republican, as Christian in their teaching, as the two I have named. I am quite sure that if such was the case it would improve the political opinions of my colleague and valued friend.

"There are," as one of these poor souls has written, and I read it from his own manuscript—

"There are over thirty benevolent, literary, and civic organizations among them, by which their needy, superannuated, and infirm are cared for to a large extent, the city government having none, or the least possible per cent., of colored paupers to support."

Tolerably good English for John F. Cook, whose complexion stamps him with such evident inferiority to my colleague!

My colleague says that the white men of this District have given evidences of patriotism, and cites the number of men who entered District regiments under the President's first call in proof of his allegation. Sir, I have gone to the War Department, day after day and night after night, to beg for the release from service, or transfer to Pennsylvania regiments, of that gentleman's constituents and my own, who, having rushed to the District of Columbia without arms, ready to die in any ditch in defense of this capital, and being here were entrapped into District regiments, and whose families were suffering because the people of the District did not provide for soldiers' families as those of Pennsylvania did. The gentleman compares the number of volunteers furnished by the District of Columbia, under the first call, with the number furnished by Massachusetts. I ask him whether he does not know that this District gave scarcely a man that belonged to it by birth or long-continued residence; that she entrapped into her regiments his constituents and mine, and those of every northern member who may have happened to be here?

Mr. BOYER. As I understand the gentleman to ask me a question—

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to be interrupted just now. I remember, Mr. Speaker, to have been here the day after the President issued his proclamation, and to have seen one of the volunteer companies of the District, ordered out for temporary defense, marched on a dreary, wet morning to the front of the War Department, and I saw Colonel Thomas propose to swear these members in. The company numbered eighty; and when the Colonel proposed the oath that would bind them to fight for and not against the Union all excepting thirty-seven stepped out; and those proved to be nearly all northern men, temporarily residing in the District.

He must take other calls than the first, under which so many northern men were entrapped, if he would settle the question he raised. Let him see how it was under later calls. I remember another scene. After long persuasion, the Administration consented to permit the colored man to attest his manhood upon the field of battle. I went to Mason's Island on the second or third day after the announcement of that determination, and found nearly a regiment of colored men swarming there without officers, save Colonel (now General) William Birney and a second lieutenant. They were poor and ignorant, but clustered in groups, those whose intellectual eyes slavery had almost put out, were, through the instrumentality of pamphlets and newspapers, sometimes torn fragments, beginning to see day dawn, by the labors of their more fortunate associates, who were acting as teachers. From these shreds and patches of paper they were beginning to prepare themselves to perform the civic duties of American citizens, while preparing to go forth and lay down their lives, if need be, in maintaining American republican institutions.

In the comparison of these two scenes, you have a capital indication of the relative patriotism of the two races in the capital of our country. I know the district from which my colleague comes, and how blind its devotion to the organization called the Democratic party is, but I ask him whether he dare go through that district proclaiming that he regards a "white grayback" who fought against the country as a better citizen and more entitled to its protection than a negro who fought for it? You give to the poor, ignorant, drunken, squalid rebel who has returned the right to vote. Why will you not give it to the intelligent, sober, tax-paying, house-holding negro?

Mr. BOYER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether in any part of my speech I said anything about traitors voting?

Mr. KELLEY. I find upon my notes that in the gentleman's speech there was a vindication of the patriotism of the people of this District, and an admission, not in this language, but in this spirit, that the negro man, like a rat when driven to a corner, had fought a little. Has the gentleman forgotten Port Hudson and Milliken's Bend? Do the papers he reads belong to that class which excluded from their columns everything about colored soldiers and American victories? If they do, let him study the story of Battery Wagner before he permits his speech to be printed, so that he may say one generous word for those who died that he and his might be blessed.

For whom do we propose to legislate? My colleague says that the black man is not equal to the white man.

I know some white men who are not equal to black men: [Laughter.] I would not intimate that my colleague was in that class, for I know his powers and his virtues; yet among his constituents he may possibly have associated at some time, even in his manhood, with men less cultivated and powerful than Fred. Douglass or Benjamin Bannaker, the publicly recognized friend of Jefferson, and who honored the early annals of our native State and made it known in France and over the breadth of the Continent when no other native mathematician had.

I turn, sir, to show the House for whom we ask suffrage. Here is the likeness of Henry Highland Garnett. It is mighty black. [Laughter.] My colleague cannot say that his grandmother had an injection of white blood in her veins. You see the likeness of a pure African there. But the face, black as it is, is radiant with intelligence, manliness, and piety. The pamphlet it embellishes contains a sermon he preached in this Hall on Sunday, February 12, 1865. With exquisite satire, he assumed, by his text, to characterize the scribes and Pharisees of old, but sketched the members of the modern Democratic party. [Laughter.] He took for his text Matthew xxiii, 4:

"For they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them upon man's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers."

His discourse is not powerful, eloquent, and elaborate as that of my colleague; but it contains some passages with which I beg leave briefly to detain the House. He says, as he progresses:

"Let us here take up the golden rule, and adopt the self-applicative mode of reasoning to those who hold these erroneous views. Come, gird up thy loins and answer like a man, if thou canst, is slavery, as it is seen in its origin, continuance, and end, the best possible condition for thee? O, no! Wilt thou bear that burden upon thy shoulders which thou wouldst lay upon thy fellow-man? No. Wilt thou bear a part of it, or remove a little of its weight with one of thy fingers? The sharp and indignant answer is, No, no."

It strikes me that this matter is pretty well put by a black man who is too poor and ignorant to be allowed to vote on the question as to who shall administer the local laws and mend the roads of this District!

Again, sir, he says:

"We ask, and only ask, that when our poor frail bark is launched on life's ocean,

"Bound on a voyage of awful length,
And dangers little known,"

that, in common with others, we may be furnished with rudder, helm, and sails, and charts, and compass. Give us good pilots to conduct us to the open seas: lift no false lights along the dangerous coasts; and if it shall please God to send us propitious winds or fearful gales, we shall survive or perish, as our energies or neglect shall determine. We ask no special favors, but we plead for justice. While we scorn unmanly dependence, in the name of God, the universal Father, we demand the right to live and labor, and to enjoy the fruits of our toil."

Will gentlemen on the other side consider this extract from the discourse of that black likeness of our Almighty Father?

The gentleman denies our power, our moral right. What right has he to the word moral upon his lips when pleading such a cause as that to which he devoted his hour? Neither morals nor religion sanction the principles he uttered. Sir, we have the power, and that power belongs to us alone, for the Constitution of the United States confides the legislation for this District in its very first article to the Congress of the United States.

But perhaps, Mr. Speaker, he means that we have not the power to confer citizenship upon a new class of people. I ask him to study the subject, and I think he will find that when the Constitution of the United States was adopted the free colored man voted in our own Pennsylvania, and continued to do it until the Democratic party modified the constitution in 1838, and that they enjoyed the franchise in all the States except South Carolina, and possibly Delaware and Virginia, in which two States suffrage was regulated by statutory and not by constitutional provision.

Mr. BOYER. Will my colleague allow me a personal explanation?

Mr. KELLEY. I will.

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman states that I said that Congress had no power to pass this bill. I said no such thing. On the contrary, I expressly admitted the power of Congress to pass it. But I did deny the moral right of Congress to pass it in the face of the almost unanimous expression of the people of this District against it.

Several MEMBERS. That is so. Moral right.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman argued that it was against the will of the majority. But I accept his modification very gladly. Moral right is, in my judgment, power.

In the President's first message—and I am very happy to know that I am sustaining his views when pressing this matter upon Congress—he has told us that were he in Tennessee he would advocate the extension of suffrage to the colored people of that State. And that being the case, I know he is its friend here; indeed, he has so assured me personally. The President, however, falls into a slight error in the course of his message. On page 13, I find it written:

"But while I have no doubt that now, after the close of the war, it is not competent for the General Government to extend the elective franchise in the several States, it is equally clear that good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife. We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two races to live side by side in a state of mutual benefit and good will. The experiment involves us in no inconsistency; let us, then, go on and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened. The country is in need of labor, and the freedmen are in need of employment, culture, and protection. While their right of voluntary migration and expatriation is not to be questioned, I would not advise their forced removal and colonization. Let us rather encourage them to honorable and useful industry, where it may be beneficial to themselves and to the country; and, instead of hasty anticipations of the certainty of failure, let there be nothing wanting to the fair trial of the experiment."

Sir, it is evident that the absorbing duties in which he was engaged while military governor of Tennessee, and in the high office to which he was so suddenly and unexpectedly called, have prevented President Johnson from examining that question historically. We have been in a murky political atmosphere for thirty or forty years, and our views of historical matters have been bedimmed. I turn to James Madison to vindicate the sagacity of the founders of our Government. Those founders built not for a generation but for all time. They were skillful architects, and understood the laws and principles of the business they undertook. They built by square and compass and rule, and omitted neither corner-stone nor key-stone from any arch in the temple they constructed to be the abode of freedom in all time. They made it the duty of the United States Government to guaranty to each State a republican form of Government, and having done that they did not fail to provide the means by which the Government on which they had laid that duty should be able to perform it. And they gave Congress the amplest power to execute that section, when, in section four, article one, they provided that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, sir, what did they mean by that provision? Let James Madison, Patrick Henry—the eloquent champion of State rights—Nicholas, Clay, Wyeth, Tyler; let Monroe, who interrogated Madison on the point in question, Alexander White, George Mason, Governor Randolph, Corbin, and Grayson, all answer. Sir, could the shades of the great departed respond, they would all reply "You have expressed its purpose as announced to us by James Madison, and we assented to it as an essential power." They all participated in the debates of the day, to which I now refer. I read from Elliott's Debates in the convention of Virginia upon adopting the Constitution, on Friday, June 13, 1788. The fourth and fifth sections of the Constitution being under consideration—

"Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentlemen who had been in the Federal Convention would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had an ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators; and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senator."

Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, the correspondent and friend of Washington—the collaborer of Washington from the hour they became members-elect of the convention to the close of the adoption of its work by the people—answered this searching question; and the great statesmen whose names I have mentioned sat around and were satisfied with the answer. No member of the convention took exception to it. Mr. Madison said:

"Mr. Chairman, the reason of the exception was, that if Congress should fix the place of choosing the Senators, it might compel the State Legislature to elect them in a different place from that of their usual sessions, which would produce some inconvenience, and was not necessary for the object of regulating the elections. But it was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators to prevent its own dissolution."

Mark the reason.

"With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

What one of the great men whom I have named, and who participated in that day's debate, dissented from that doctrine? What other member of that convention of great Virginians questioned it? Not one; and Mr. Monroe followed by asking an explanation of the clause which prohibits either House, during the session of Congress, from adjourning for more than three days without the consent of the other. It was the undoubted opinion of the State of Virginia that the question, which our excellent President assumes to be one beyond a doubt, was settled by the express language of the Constitution right the other way. Had Washington dissented from this view he would not have failed to have made his dissent known. He doubtless concurred in this opinion of his distinguished and confidential collaborer.

A word or two to my colleague about confiding matters to the will of the majority by denying a voice to the minority. I was brought up in the Democratic party. I honor and adhere most loyally to the teachings of its fathers and early leaders, and gladly go as to a pure fountain, with which I am thoroughly familiar, to the writings of James Madison for guidance on points like these. Speaking, in a letter to James Monroe, from Philadelphia, October 5, 1786, of a "certain measure," which he does not name, he says:

"Should the measure triumph under the patronage of nine States, or even of the whole thirteen, I shall never be convinced that it is expedient, because I cannot conceive it to be just."

I do not wonder that my colleague, who is much younger than I am, 'should think that justice is not a proper standard for Democratic legislators to adopt; but in the good old times they often did it.

"There is no maxim, in my opinion, which is more liable to be misapplied, and which, therefore, more needs elucidation, than the current one, that the interest of the majority is the political standard of right and wrong. Taking the word 'interest' as synonymous with 'ultimate happiness,' in which sense it is qualified with every necessary moral ingredient, the proposition is no doubt true. But taking it in the popular sense, as referring to immediate augmentation of property and wealth, nothing can be more false. In the latter sense, it would be the interest of the majority in every community to despoil and enslave the minority of individuals." * * * *

"In fact, it is only reestablishing, under another name and a more specious form, force as the measure of right."

I stand by Madison against all the modern Democratic leaders. Sir, what has been the result of leaving these people in voiceless and powerless subjection to the rule of the majority here in this District? Let them speak through their own memorial presented to this House. I will read but a brief part of it, remarking that it was drawn up by a colored man:

"We are intelligent enough to be industrious, to have accumulated property, to build and sustain churches and institutions of learning. We are and have been educating our children without the aid of any school fund, and until recently had for many years been furnishing, unjustly as we deem, a portion of the means for the education of the white children of the District."

Is it not possible that a majority may perpetrate an injustice? Does it not seem that one has been persistently perpetrating an injustice? But to the petition again:

"We are intelligent enough to be amenable to the same laws and punishable alike with others for the infraction of said laws. We sustain as fair a character on the records of crime and statistics of pauperism as any other class in the community, while unequal laws are continually barring our way in the effort to reach and possess ourselves of the blessings attendant upon a life of industry and self-denial and of virtuous citizenship."

And again:

"Experience likewise teaches that that debasement is most humane which is most complete. The possession of only a partial liberty makes us more keenly sensible of the injustice of withholding those other rights which belong to a perfect manhood. Without the right of suffrage we are without protection and liable to combinations of outrage. Petty officers of the law, respecting the source of power, will naturally defer to the one having a vote, and the partiality thus shown will work much to the disadvantage of the colored citizens."

Sir, the rule of a majority not qualified by the power of the minority to resist is a despotism. The gentleman talks about a republican form of Government existing without the vital principles of a republic, and I again ask him to turn to and consult the Democratic fathers on that subject. I fear he is not familiar with them. Mr. Madison, in a debate in the Virginia convention, which I find reported on page 310 of third volume Elliot's Debates, points out the distinction between a nominal and a real republic. He says:

"Holland is a favorite quotation with the honorable members on the other side of the question. Had not their sentiments been discovered by other circumstances, I should have concluded from their reasoning on this occasion that they were friends of the Constitution; I should suppose they had forgotten which side of the question they were on. Holland has been called a republican Government, friendly to liberty. Though it may be greatly superior to other Governments in Europe, still it is not a republic or a democracy. Their legislature consists, in some degree, of men who legislate for life. Their council consists of men who hold their offices for life, who fill up offices and appoint their salaries. The people have no agent, mediate or immediate, in the Government."

So far as these educated, industrious, tax-paying, school-sustaining, church-building people of this District are concerned, they are shut out of our democratic Republic as the people of Holland were. How bitterly would Madison, unimpassioned as he was, have denounced such treachery to the essential principle of republicanism—universal suffrage.

Sir, I am trespassing, perhaps, at too great length, but I am a proud man as an American citizen; whatever I may be personally. I boast of the resources, the powers, the extent of my country, and the enduring character of its institutions, and of the fair and generous character of my countrymen. I cannot bear to be goaded and taunted by those whom I treat as inferiors, with the assertion that in the hour of my danger, when I refused or was unable to fight, they took up my battle and healed my wounded honor. The negroes fought for me, and God forbid that they should ever taunt me, or my descendants with the fact that I was an ingrate to the soldiers of the Republic.

I hold in my hand a little verse inscribed

AFRICA TO AMERICA.

In the day of thy need I have battled for thee;
At the hour of thy triumph thou knowest not me.
My blood fed thy rivers, it crimsoned thy sea;
Yet an outcast am I in the "Land of the Free."

The hand that the sword sped the pen may not hold;
Benumbed is the tongue which the war march controlled;

And the foot that stood firm when the cannon ball rolled,
Must flee from the spot where the ballot is polled.

Thy friend was my friend, and thy foe was my foe;
Yet to-day not a friend in thy councils I know.
To the grave marched my slain with a tread not as slow

As the course of the justice thy servants bestow.

The life which 'twixt thy life and treason's dart flew,
Is felled 'neath thy flag by the traitorous crew,
To the soul that no love but its country's love knew,
Nor statute, nor scripture, nor conscience is true.

Sir, I cannot bear the thought that that poem should be repeated by African lips in my hearing with truth; or at least that I shall not be able to respond, "That disgrace attaches only to the vulgarly arrogant or ignorantly debased people of our country; the good, wise, and true are all laboring to obliterate and efface it."

Can one reason be suggested for withholding from the Africo-American citizens of this District the right of suffrage essential to republican institutions, to the maintenance of "fundamental principles of the Revolution," and "dangerous," as Jefferson said, "to only tyrants?" No. And, sir, the Republican members of Congress are not the only legislators who are pleading for the enfranchisement of the laboring man. Our contest is broader than our continent. We are fighting for and the Democratic party against the enfranchisement of the laboring men of Great Britain.

The same question that pends before us hangs upon a hair in the entranced gaze of the laboring masses of what we too fondly call "the mother country." I ask my colleague, who spoke so kindly of the German, the Englishman, the Scotchman, and the Irishman, whether he is willing to send across the ocean an encouraging word to the despots of the British Government, and to set an example which will justify them in saying, "We will withhold from the laboring people this right, for the great democratic republic country has had the question under discussion, and has decided that people poor and ignorant as are our laboring classes ought not to have the right of suffrage?" If gentlemen on the other side do, they will hear songs that were not sung in the "Groves of Blarney."

Mr. KELLEY. I have but a few words more to say.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] be extended, so as to enable him to conclude his remarks on this subject.

No objection was made.

Mr. KELLEY. With thanks to the House for its courtesy, I will continue for a few minutes to plead the cause of the oppressed of all lands. I plead, Mr. Speaker, and members of the American Congress, with you, to help to enfranchise the laboring people of Great Britain. When John Bright uttered his recent speech a deputation of them sat before him and he alluded to them. And I point around these galleries to the maimed and wounded soldiers of the armies of America, whose skin is not colored like our own. I point to intelligent men, black and yellow, descendants of the kings of Dahomey and of American Congressmen, Senators, Presidents, and Cabinet ministers, and ask you to give them, as laboring people and republican soldiers, the rights of citizenship. John Bright said:

"Let me now put to you, before I sit down, a single proposition, and through these gentlemen who sit below me, to whom freedom in this country is so greatly and so constantly indebted, let me put it to the people of this kingdom, if of the five millions who are now shut out one million were admitted—and you will mark the extreme, some will say blamable, moderation of that suggestion—if only one million were admitted, would not the cry of the toil-laden and the suffering, which even now ascends to heaven—would it not, think you, reach further, be heard even on the floor of Parliament? For do not forget that the ear of the Supreme is nearer even to the lowliest of us than is that of our earthly rulers. But if that voice was heard in Parliament would it not, perchance, do something to still the roar of faction, and to bend the powers of statesmanship to the high and holy purposes of humanity and of justice?"

"I speak not the language of party. I feel myself above the level of party. I speak as I have ever endeavored to speak on behalf of the unenfranchised, the almost voiceless millions of my countrymen. Their claim is just, and it is constitutional. It will be heard, it cannot be rejected. To the outward eye monarchs and Parliaments seem to rule with an absolute and unquestioned sway; but, and I quote the words which one of our old Puritan poets has left for us—

"There is on earth a yet angustier thing, Veiled though it be, than Parliament or king."

"That angustier thing is the tribunal which God has set up in the consciences of men. It is before that tribunal that I am now permitted humbly to plead, and there is something in my heart—a small but an exultant voice—which tells me I shall not plead in vain."

Mr. ROGERS obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. With the permission of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] I will now move an adjournment.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RAYMOND. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] yield to me a moment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND. I introduced two bills yesterday, one in regard to naturalization, and the other in relation to the New York city post office. I ask the consent of this House that they be printed.

No objection was made, and the bills were accordingly ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. ASHLEY, the House (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. Dr. GILLETTE, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise to a privileged question. I believe there is an error in the Journal of yesterday's proceedings in this: it does not contain in the order for printing the message of the President in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 21st of December, which I had the honor to submit, an order also to publish the documents accompanying the message. The motion was to print both the message and the accompanying documents, and I observe that the Journal does not contain that latter part of the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order was entered to print the communication and the accompanying documents. Generally, it is understood that an order being entered to print a message covers the accompanying documents; but if it is not so, it will be so extended as to cover them.

Mr. HOWARD. If that be the usage of the Senate, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be corrected to comprise them, if it does not already.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, information in regard to the appointment of commissioners under the twenty-fourth section of the act of February 21, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1863, and the awards made by those commissioners, and why payments on awards have been suspended; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John Pridgeon, owner of the steam-tug W. K. Muir, praying for the passage of an act permitting that tug to be enrolled and licensed as an American vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John Pridgeon and William K. Muir, owners of the steam-tug Michigan, a foreign-built vessel, praying for the passage of an act granting enrollment and license to that tug as an American vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John A. Sloan, owner of the steam-tug Dispatch, praying for an American register for that tug; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of St. Joseph, Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the repair of the harbor of St. Joseph, on Lake Michigan, and the extension of the south pier of that harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of the officers and members of the American Baptist Missionary Convention of the colored Baptist churches of this country, representing fifty-five ministers and fifteen thousand members, in annual convention last August. They set forth at length various arguments in favor of equal rights and justice to the colored race, and conclude by asking Congress to secure the extension of the right of suffrage to all the citizens of our common country without respect to color, not only on the ground of essential and acknowledged right according to the Declaration of Independence, but also because they believe there is no other way in which we can be protected from the subtle power of our common enemy. I move the reference of this petition to the joint committee of the two Houses on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of John Ahern, praying for compensation for board and rations furnished to United States soldiers and recruits at Albany, New York, in the years 1863 and 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of soldiers of the United States Army, who enlisted in the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, praying an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Townley and Denman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the report of the Court of Claims in favor of the claim of Sarah Weed be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That Lemuel Worster have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to give notice that when these bills shall have been printed, with the amendments, I will call the attention of the Senate to them at an early day.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 68) to carry into effect the fourth article of the treaty of Washington, concluded between Great Britain and the United States on the 9th of August, 1842; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) to refer the claim of Gustavus A. Balzer to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 13) respecting the three months' extra pay to officers of volunteers when mustered out of service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MEXICAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence in possession of the Government in regard to a negotiation carried on with the republican Government of Mexico in 1861 for the purpose of marching a body of United States troops from Guaymas to Arizona, through Mexican territory.

OFFICIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report for the information of the Senate, the amounts paid, or agreed to be paid, to each of the newspapers of the city of Washington, since the 1st of March, 1865, and the laws under which the amounts were paid; and to report if any legislation is necessary in regard to advertisements in the public press of the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 33) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) for increasing the bond of the Superintendent of Public Printing; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

ASSISTANT ASSESSORS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to take up, if the Senate please, and have acted upon, the little bill that I reported from the Committee on Finance yesterday. It is House bill No. 58. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint assistant assessors of internal revenue.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That all such persons, before entering upon the duties of assistant assessors, and before being entitled to the salary or other emoluments thereof, shall take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It is simply reenacting what is clearly now the law. The law already requires that the officers shall take that oath; and this amendment merely proposes that we shall pass a new law to the same effect. I cannot see what the object of the honorable Senator is in reenacting it.

Mr. SUMNER. I will explain what my object is. We have on our table a report (which I think is one of the most extraordinary documents ever laid on our table) from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he sets forth that he has undertaken to disobey the act of Congress prescribing the oath. He makes this report deliberately. In the course of it he says:

"Even if the offices were desirable to any but residents, I have not supposed that it would be the policy of Congress to subject the people of the South to the humiliation, or the revenue system to the odium, which would be the result of employing northern men to collect Federal taxes in the southern States; and I have not doubted that Congress would so modify the oath that this Department would be sustained in employing in the collecting of the revenues those who, by circumstances which they could not control, had been forced into the rebellion, but of whose present loyalty there is no question."

He then proceeds to report that James M. Matthews entered upon the duties of collector of the customs at Tappahannock, Virginia; William S. Croft upon the duties of collector at Georgetown, South Carolina; Gordon Forbes the duties of surveyor at Yeocomico, Virginia; William Y. Leitch the duties of surveyor at Charleston, South Carolina; F. M. Robertson the duties of special examiner of drugs at Charleston, South Carolina; Edgar M. Lazarus the duties of appraiser at Charleston, South Carolina; J. F. W. Walter the duties of appraiser at Charleston, South Carolina, without taking this oath; and he adds, by way of supplement to his report, the form of the oath which they did take, being an alteration of the oath prescribed by Congress. Now, if this had been in one case or two cases, it might have been an accident; but it is not an accident; the Secretary acknowledges it all; he avows it as a system on which he entered. He then goes on and furnishes a list of some—I have not counted them, but I should say there must be some twenty-five names of officers who have entered upon their functions without taking this oath, in addition to the list which I have already read.

Now, it seems to me that this course on the part of the Secretary ought to be corrected. I know no way in which it can be reached except through the action of Congress. It seems to me, therefore, Congress ought in the most formal way to remind the Secretary of the act which he has chosen to set aside. Nobody here of course recognizes his power to set aside an act of Congress. Nobody of course will undertake to justify him. Let us, then, remind him in the way that is left to us, here from our seats, that that act of Congress must be obeyed.

These are the reasons which have prevailed with me in offering this amendment. I say sincerely I do not wish to differ with the honorable Senator from Maine, who has the conduct of the bill. If in his opinion, after what I have stated, the provision is unnecessary, if he thinks that the Secretary of the Treasury does not need from Congress this reminder, if he thinks the past conduct of the Secretary is such as to give us assurance that for the future he will obey the acts of Congress, then I shall be glad to follow his lead and dispense with this proviso; but, as at present advised, I do think it important.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the Secretary admits unquestionably, in the communication he has made, that he did undertake in certain cases to appoint men, and did not require of them the oath prescribed. He has given his reasons for that course. We must reflect that this act of the Secretary was done during the recess of Congress; and so long as we believe, as I truly do believe, that the Secretary of the Treasury is a most patriotic gentleman and desires to do his whole duty, and has taken this responsibility under the pressure of what he conceived to be the necessities of the case, and has laid the facts frankly before Congress, I do not feel that it is necessary to go any further than we have gone with regard to it. He has stated the fact; he has stated his reasons for his conduct, and although those reasons might not be satisfactory to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and might not be satisfactory to myself, yet he says very frankly, "I deemed it better to appoint, if possible, men that I could trust to collect the revenue in those States, and I found it impossible to appoint men of that description who could take the oath. I concluded, therefore, to take the responsibility, which I have taken during the recess of Congress, because I deemed it very important that the revenue should be collected." He has laid that before Congress, and he has presented to Congress his recommendation that the oath should be varied, if possible, to meet certain cases. I would say further that I understand the Secretary warned these gentlemen that if they took the offices under these circumstances it would be entirely dependent on the action of Congress whether they would be paid; that they could not be paid until the matter was legalized and authorized.

Having done that and frankly laid what he has done and his reasons for doing it before Congress, if Congress, after having had an opportunity to consider the subject, shall take no such action as he advises, of course it will be his duty to yield at once and cheerfully and decidedly to the decision of Congress, and I have no doubt he will do so with great readiness. He is already "reminded" by the call which Congress has made upon him to lay before it the facts in the case, and he is aware of this discussion. I do not deem it necessary therefore to give him any further reminder. But at any rate the words proposed to be inserted here by the honorable Senator are merely a reenactment of what is now the law of the land. Its adoption secures nothing more than we now have on the statute-book. If we desire to do anything more, if we desire to censure the Secretary of the Treasury for what he has done, this is not the way to do it. The adoption of the amendment will merely embarrass the passage of this bill by requiring it to be sent back to the other House. I hope the Senator will consent to withdraw his amendment, the reminder having already been given, and let the bill be passed as it has been sent to us from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as I understand the statute of 1862, it creates a disqualification in the case of every person to hold an office under the United States who does not take the oath prescribed by that statute. I confess that with me it is a serious matter to appoint to office any person who does not take the oath there prescribed. It appears to me that a question of law of considerable importance arises, which is this: whether a person not having taken this oath and taking upon himself the responsibilities of such an office can be held legally responsible for his acts. Can he be sued upon his official bond and held responsible for any default which he may commit to the Government, if he has not taken this oath? Whether the law be the one way or the other upon that particular point, it appears to me to be a question of sufficient importance to receive the careful attention of the Senate. The act of 1862 declares that no person shall exercise an office under the United States who does not take the following oath:

"I do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

That is the form prescribed by the statute. In some cases in which persons have been appointed to office by the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that he has waived this oath, and prescribed another, which is in the following form. I read from his own report:

"I, ———, having been appointed to the office of collector of customs for the district of ———, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly swear that I will diligently and faithfully execute the duties of the said office of collector of the customs, and will use the best of my endeavors to prevent and detect frauds in relation to the duties imposed by the laws of the United States. I further swear that I will support the Constitution of the United States."

It will be seen at a glance that a very material part of the statutory oath is here dispensed with, and that part is, that the officer has never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since he has been a citizen thereof. It is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury that he has found it very difficult, not to say impossible, in certain districts in the insurgent States to find persons who were able to take the statutory oath; and it would seem that therefore he has omitted to enforce that provision of the statute of 1862. I know not where this dispensing power may not go. If a plain statute of the United States may be dispensed with in one case, it may in another. It is the misfortune of the country if it be impossible to find a loyal man in a southern district who is able to take the oath required. It does not in my judgment pertain to the Secretary of the Treasury or any other functionary of the Government to undertake to alter the laws which we pass; and it seems to me that he would be better consulting the interests of the United States, better consulting his own duty, to have referred this whole subject to Congress for further legislation than to have undertaken to set himself up as a legislator on so serious a subject as this.

I say this, however, sir, without any intention of casting a reflection upon the very intelligent and very able Secretary of the Treasury. I rather speak of it as an admonition to all officers and persons in authority that the first example which they are to set to the country is obedience to the laws. If the laws are defective, the Congress of the United States possesses the necessary power to correct them.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will be adopted, and I shall of course vote for it. I think it necessary as an admonition to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury that we, the Congress of the United States, are the law-making power, and that his duties are confined simply and solely to the execution of the laws as they are enacted here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I sincerely hope that gentlemen will not insist upon this. It is a queer idea that we are to pass over again, as an amendment to a mere provision like this, a law now on the statute-book, by way of admonishing the Secretary of the Treasury as to what he is to do. You might in that way multiply our statutes indefinitely. As I said before, if the Senators desire to admonish the Secretary of the Treasury let them offer a resolution to that effect, and, if the admonition is deserved and it is thought advisable to give it, the resolution will undoubtedly be passed.

But here is a little statute of two lines, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint certain officers, and on that the Senators propose to ingraft by way of amendment that those officers shall comply with the laws of the land. Why? Because it is necessary? Not at all. Because it is not the law now? Not at all; but because they want to remind the Secretary that that is the law, and so to remind him after we have already sent to him for a report on the subject and have got that report, in which he avows the fact. He is then already reminded to all intents and purposes. Now, if after being reminded, he chooses to go on and disobey the law; if his action is disobedience—and to a certain extent it undoubtedly is—and he has given his reasons for not fully obeying the law, gentlemen can take other and more efficient measures to remind him of the existence of that statute. But now I put it to the honorable Senator from Michigan—he cannot help laughing at it himself—that the idea is a perfect absurdity of ingrafting a statute now on the book, passed two years ago, by way of a rider upon this little bill, for the sake of reminding the Secretary that that is the law! Who ever heard of such a course of proceeding in a grave legislative body?

Now, sir, I might have acted differently from the course taken by the Secretary of the Treasury. He chose to take the responsibility, in the recess of Congress, for what seemed to him to be good reasons; another person might have done otherwise; but nobody can doubt that he felt it to be his duty to take that responsibility under the circumstances. If we think that he was in error, that he had no right to take it, he has already received notice that we question the propriety of his action, and if that is not enough we can put it in such terms that he cannot mistake our opinion; but for the sake of the statute-book do not make it look ridiculous for the mere purpose of reminders. That is what I ask of honorable gentlemen. Let the bill pass, and then if they wish to introduce anything by way of bringing it more completely and satisfactorily to the Secretary's mind that he has disobeyed the statute, do it in proper form. The Senators themselves, I apprehend, have that opinion of the Secretary and that respect for him that, even if in their judgment he has committed an error, they will not take what is an offensive course until they become satisfied that he is determined to persist in his error. It is not treating an officer of the Government, especially one of our own friends, with that regard which should always be shown until we believe that there is really a collision between him and us. I have no doubt that if the Secretary is satisfied that this his course is disapproved, and that Congress will not change the law on the subject, he will conform to that decision, because it will be his duty to conform to it, whatever may be the results upon the revenue. I beg leave to remind gentlemen that when a man is put at the head of the revenue department and his attention is turned that way, especially in the existing state of things, it becomes the leading idea in his mind, and others are apt to be subordinate to it, and he is apt to take responsibilities in certain cases that he would not otherwise take, believing that Congress will sustain him. I acted on that principle several times while I was at the head of that Department. I was not found out; I have not been found out yet; but I may be, and then I shall expect to be reminded by Congress that I took a responsibility that I had no business to take, and I must take the consequences.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will you tell what it was?
Mr. FESSENDEN. No, not until the time comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. That was in war times.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was in war times; but these are so very near war times that in regard to collecting revenue the same doctrine perhaps may be held to apply. Now, I really trust the Senate will not put a law which is already clearly on the statute-book again on to this little bill for the sake of reminding the Secretary of what he knows perfectly well.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no anxiety, sir, for the statute-book; I do not enter into the feelings of the Senator from Maine on that point, and I say frankly that my judgment cannot accept his conclusion; at the same time I say with equal frankness I am going to follow his suggestion. I do it against my own judgment and out of deference to him. He has this bill in charge, and in the exercise of his discretion he objects to the Senate ingrafting upon it this new injunction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Old injunction.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says "old injunction." I want the old injunction made new because of the exigency. The Senator asks who ever heard of such a thing being done by a legislative body as reenacting an old law? Who ever before heard of such a thing being done in this country, by a branch of the executive, as deliberately setting aside an important statute of the land? Sir, this is a grave matter, and I desire to say here openly, and with all possible personal kindness for the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, which I am sure I have as much as any Senator now before me, that I consider his course on this occasion as most mischievous to the country, utterly unprecedented, and deserving the rebuke of Congress. It belongs to the other House properly to consider where a member of the executive Government has violated the laws of the land; but the Senate, as it seemed to me, might, without impropriety, replace once more on the statute-book a provision dear to the people of this country at this moment, which that officer had undertaken to disregard. I have no sensitiveness about reenactment. I should like to see it reenacted again. What is good we may as well repeat, line upon line, and precept upon precept; and I believe this Congress would not err now if it should again embody in the legislation of the country all those important and fundamental provisions which it regards as essential to the public peace. The public peace, in my opinion, has been endangered by the course of the Secretary of the Treasury. He has given encouragement to rebels where he should have given encouragement only to the devoted friends of the Union. He has taken rebels by the hand, and has invested them with the powers of this Government under the Constitution of the United States; and in doing that he has offended against the laws of the land. But I have already said that I shall accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine. My purpose has been accomplished in calling the attention of the country to the course of the Secretary and in solemnly reminding him from my place here of his duties.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator cannot withdraw it while I have the floor; and as I have the floor I will say a word.

Mr. President, I was very much gratified by a sentiment that was uttered by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] in the conclusion of his remarks. It was to this effect, that the Senate should remind the Secretary of the Treasury and all other officers that the highest duty of an officer was obedience to the law. I certainly approve fully that truth, and I think that that lesson could be studied with very great advantage by the members of the Senate, and particularly by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] He speaks to the same effect, and with all his peculiar and distinctive emphasis, that the Secretary ought to be admonished that it is his duty to observe and to have executed the law. How often has the Senator from Massachusetts within a very few years proclaimed in relation to the fugitive slave law that he would not execute that law! How often have his people, and men holding high position in office in the State of Massachusetts assumed defiance to the execution of that law of Congress notwithstanding their oaths of office!

It is the duty of Congress to pass laws, and it is the province of this branch of Congress to take its part in the act of passing laws; but whose duty is it to execute the laws, or to see that the laws are executed? I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, what power has the Senate to assume to itself the office of seeing that a law of Congress shall be executed? According to my reading of the Constitution, it is the executive function and the duty of the President of the United States to see that this and all other laws are executed. When Congress has passed a law, their jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the law is functus officio. It then passes into the hands of another department of the Government, and it becomes a function of the President or the chief Executive of the Government of the United States to see that the law is executed.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts asks for a remedy. What remedy does he propose? He says there is a law upon the statute-book which requires officers to take a particular oath, and that the Secretary of the Treasury has dispensed with the enforcement of that law in relation to particular officers, and has, therefore, exercised a dispensing power. When it is convenient or agreeable to the Senator to have a dispensing power exercised he is very willing to have it exercised, but in no other state of case. How many laws have been dispensed with during this war in accordance with the feelings and purposes of that honorable Senator, and to which dispensation he has given his full sanction and approbation!

Mr. President, I think it would be puerile to reenact the clause of the law to which the Senator refers, and which he wishes to have reenacted by his amendment. Why? If the Secretary of the Treasury will not execute one law, he would not execute another law on the same subject if another law should be piled on that one. What additional obligation would there be upon the Secretary of the Treasury to execute this law, if the Senator's amendment should be adopted by the Senate and accepted by the House of Representatives? None. Is the case without a remedy? Not at all. Whose duty and whose office is it to see that this law is executed? It is that of the President. The President may require the Secretary to execute the law, and if the Secretary is contumacious and refuses to execute the law, the President may remove him. That is one remedy.

There is another remedy. If it is objected that these officers are executing the functions of their respective places without having taken that oath, let the Senator from Massachusetts, or any man who chooses, sue out a writ of quo warranto against them to know by what authority they are executing those offices. That is a plain remedy.

There may be still another remedy. Suppose the Senator from Massachusetts resorts to the courts of the country and asks for a writ of mandamus directed to these officers to take the oath which, he says, they have omitted to take. Why, sir, the legal and appropriate remedies for such a case are strewn all around the Senator. All that he or any gentleman has to do is to resort to these appropriate constitutional remedies. But instead of that he comes into the Senate and asks the Senate to undertake the office of seeing that the law of Congress is executed, when the Senate has not a figment of power to any such end.

I suppose that if this amendment should prevail, the matter would have just the same legal effect and no more, even if it should become a part of the new law, that it now has. It seems to me to be supererogation, and to be, on the part of the Senate, infringing upon the executive functions of the Government of the United States in regard to the execution of its law, to take the present action in furtherance of the motive which the honorable Senator has assigned. For myself, therefore, if the question shall be pressed upon this amendment, I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Massachusetts as withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw the proposition.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the report of the Quartermaster General for the use of the State Department, reported it back without amendment.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the annual report of the Quartermaster General be printed for the use of the Department of State.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand additional copies of certain diplomatic correspondence for the use of the Department of State, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of the documents containing diplomatic correspondence recently called for by Congress be printed for the use of the State Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is an extraordinary number of documents to print for the use of the Department. I have never known that number of any document to be called for by any Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Two thousand has been the outside.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This resolution, as I understand, proposes to print ten thousand copies of this correspondence for the use of the Department of State. We have never published such a number as that before.

Mr. SUMNER. We never published that number before by an order of the Senate. During the last year the House ordered that number.

Mr. TRUMBULL. For the State Department?

Mr. SUMNER. For the State Department. I understand they were distributed extensively throughout the nations of the earth.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to explain it, I can probably satisfy the Senator from Illinois. A statute allows the President of the United States to fix the number of copies of the diplomatic correspondence that shall be printed for the use of the Department; the Senate has nothing to do with it. The President, in his discretion, has directed that ten thousand copies of the diplomatic correspondence shall be printed, the same number that was ordered to be printed last year, for the use of the Department of State. After this correspondence had been sent in, there were a few additional letters called for by Congress and sent in; and now the Secretary of State has addressed a letter to the committee asking that the same number of copies of this additional correspondence may be printed as the President has ordered of the other. The cost will be $500.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not at all satisfied myself; I do not know how the rest of the Senate feel about it. I should like to know what the State Department does with ten thousand copies of this foreign correspondence. We have no such number of officers abroad. The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that this correspondence is sent to various parts of the world. If the Government of the United States is going to get up works upon international law and circulate them among the nations of the world for their enlightenment and benefit, I think we ought to inquire, first, what the condition of the Treasury is before we begin this system. I move to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "two thousand."

Mr. ANTHONY. If this was an original question before the Senate, and the question was whether we should print ten thousand or two thousand copies of this diplomatic correspondence, I am certain that the Committee on Printing would recommend two thousand; but the order to print ten thousand copies for the use of the Department has not been made by the Senate, but by the President of the United States under a statute.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot help that.

Mr. ANTHONY. That includes nineteen twentieths of the whole correspondence. Now comes in an additional twentieth, and this resolution proposes to print the same number of this as the other, so that the whole may be put together.

Mr. SUMNER. That clearly ought to be done.

Mr. ANTHONY. The cost of this will be $500; what the cost of the other is I do not know, because as it did not come before the Committee on Printing it has not been estimated for. The Committee on Printing never make an extravagant appropriation. It is the only economical committee in the Senate, I believe, [laughter;] and when the question is, whether we shall send out, at a large expense, an incomplete edition of this diplomatic correspondence, or whether we shall send out a complete edition at an additional expense of $500, I think the Senator from Illinois will agree that it is best to make it complete.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would remind my friend from Illinois that if his experience is like mine, the demand for the diplomatic correspondence is very great throughout the country, and I think it would be no more than safe to say that every member of Congress will be asked for fifty copies of the diplomatic correspondence. Multiply the number of members of Congress by fifty or even by thirty, and you will find that it will amount to very near ten thousand copies.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin had listened, he would have ascertained that he will not get any of these copies. It is not proposed to publish any copies for Senators to distribute. This is a proposition to publish ten thousand copies of the diplomatic correspondence for the use of the State Department. If the Senator from Wisconsin is troubled by his constituents who want to read these documents, he must get up another resolution; this has nothing to do with that. This is simply a proposition for ten thousand copies for the use of the State Department.

Mr. CONNESS. For the benefit of the Chinese. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. My friend from California suggests that it is for the benefit of the Chinese. I do not know how that may be. I am willing to admit that the chairman of the Printing Committee is a very economical person, and I am only surprised, with his sense of economy, that he should have reported this resolution. I understand from him that the original publication of ten thousand copies, which might, possibly, have been extravagant, he thinks, was ordered by the President of the United States, and that the Committee on Printing had nothing to do with it. With his views of economy, why not let the President of the United States publish this additional ten thousand if he wants to do so? Why did he bring it here at all? If he could publish the first ten thousand, I suppose he could publish this.

Mr. ANTHONY. Shall I explain?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. The President is authorized to publish whatever number he sees fit of the diplomatic correspondence that is communicated to Congress with the President's message; but he is not authorized by law to publish any other diplomatic correspondence. The volume will be incomplete without this. He has no authority to print it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will this go into that volume?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire, for information, whether the volume has not been already made up and published?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir; the volume of diplomatic correspondence is not yet printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is the case I will not object. If it is to go into that same volume, and ten thousand copies are now being printed, and this is to be a part of it, I will withdraw the motion to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "two thousand;" but it really seems to me that the law that allows the publication of ten thousand copies of this work for the use of the State Department ought to be changed. It must be attended with very large expense, and I really do not see the necessity of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Although the amendment is withdrawn, I wish to explain, in defense of the Committee on Printing, that the committee are not at all responsible for the number of copies of this document ordered. The President, in his discretion, which I certainly have no doubt is a wise discretion, has fixed upon this large number, owing to the peculiar relations of our foreign affairs, and this resolution is merely to complete the volume, just the same as though this correspondence had been sent in the day after the President's message. It was sent in in obedience to a call from one of the two Houses; I think from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois as withdrawing his motion to amend the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the amendment, after the explanation of the Senator from Rhode Island that this is to be a part of a volume which is now being published.

The resolution was adopted.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 33) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION AT PARIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the morning hour will expire in a few moments more, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion against the United States, upon which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. With the permission of my friend, the Senator from Maryland, I desire to call up, before he proceeds, the joint resolution which was under consideration yesterday, on which I desire action. It cannot take more than two minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent, the resolution before the Senate will be laid aside temporarily, and the question will be on taking up the resolution referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] called my attention yesterday to the case of the agent at New York. With regard to his compensation there is no provision in the resolution, and I promised to make inquiry at the Department of State as to his relations to the matter and what the understanding there was. I find that, in the absence of the head of the Department, who, as is well known to the Senate, is now on a voyage out of the country, there is nobody there fully possessed of the precise relations of that gentleman to this business; but it is known that he is an employé of the Department of State, holding a post which is not an office known to the law, called dispatch agent, which brings him in particular, confidential relations with the Department, and it is supposed that on that account he has been intrusted by the head of that Department with this agency in New York. Nothing is known at the Department with regard to any understanding as to his compensation. If he is to have additional compensation, it may be paid out of the contingent fund for foreign relations, out of which he is paid, as I understand, as dispatch agent; or it may be that the Secretary of State expects to come to Congress hereafter with a request for some appropriation in his behalf; but with regard to that, there is no information at the Department.

The resolution then stands in this way: nothing is said with regard to the compensation of the agent at New York; that is left open; Congress is not pledged in any way with regard to him; but the provision is simply with regard to his clerks.

And now, sir, with regard to the necessity of immediate action. I was told at the Department that every day's delay is at this moment productive of serious embarrassment. The articles must be received at Paris before some day in the coming month of March. That leaves but a very short time for the agent to act, and it is important that he should be provided with the clerks and assistants which this resolution secures to him as soon as possible.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that anything can be done in the way of fixing this salary for the general agent, because I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators are as much at a loss about it as I am. But I do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that Congress will have no responsibility in regard to this matter, because the second section of this joint resolution approves of the doings of the Secretary of State, and he has appointed this person the general agent; and therefore he becomes the general agent under the authority of Congress, and Congress will have to pay him undoubtedly. But I do not know that anything can be done now, and I shall not oppose the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate was informed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday that in a few days there would be another bill introduced upon this same general subject. I desire to be informed by the Senator from Massachusetts, if he knows and will inform the Senate, what is the character of that bill that is to come before us. I should like to see this whole question before us at once, and not be called upon to vote for or against it by piecemeal. I see it stated in the newspapers that the French Government have constructed a building for this exposition and assigned the room to be occupied by the different nations, and among others there is a small space allotted to the United States, but not near enough, and that it will be necessary for this Government to erect a building in Paris in which the articles that may be sent from this country will be exhibited. If the passage of this resolution is going to lead to the necessity of the adoption of any such measure as that, I want to know it, and I think the members of the Senate desire to know it. I understand that the Government of Belgium or the people of Belgium are in like condition with the people of the United States or with this Government; that is to say, that there has not been room assigned adequate for the exhibition of articles from the kingdom of Belgium in that exposition, and that that Government has made provision for the erection of a building that will be adequate. I apprehend that Congress is not prepared to enter upon the construction of buildings at Paris.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we are acting on this measure entirely in the dark. The Senator from Massachusetts says they cannot tell him at the State Department what has been done there in connection with this officer to whom reference has been made. The Secretary of State has departed from the country, carrying all the information with him, and the organ of this Senate, who has applied at the Department for information, is unable to obtain it; and yet the first section of this resolution declares that we indorse and approve whatever the Secretary of State may have done in connection with this subject, no matter what it may be.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I beg the Senator's pardon; we indorse what appears in the report. You indorse and approve what you have before you.

Mr. GRIMES. The first section is:

"That the proceedings heretofore adopted by the Secretary of State in relation to the said exposition, as set forth in his report and accompanying documents concerning that subject, transmitted to both Houses of Congress with the President's message of the 11th instant, are approved."

What is set forth in the report? That he has engaged certain parties, as I understand, to transact certain business, without specifying the character of the business, where the parties are, or the compensation that is to be paid to them. We approve whatever the Secretary of State may have done in selecting these agents, in fixing the compensation that is to be paid to them, and determining the character of the business that they shall do. I have not very often been called upon, I think, to vote more blindly than I am called upon to vote for, if I do vote for, the passage of this resolution. I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will allow this resolution to rest until the Secretary of State shall return from his foreign voyage, when, doubtless, we can obtain such information from him as it is necessary for us to have to enable us to vote understandingly upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. The remarks of the Senator from Iowa in their tendency go directly to insist that the United States should not in any way be represented at this greatest exhibition of agriculture, of manufactures, and of the fine arts that the world has ever known; that the United States should exile themselves from that great occasion. I do not think that the people of the country will coincide with my excellent friend in that desire. I think that the people desire to be represented at this exhibition, and that they are willing that Congress should take such careful, reasonable, and moderate steps as may be deemed advisable in order to secure such representation.

The Senator proposes that the whole question shall be laid over until the return of the Secretary of State. Is he so fortunate as to know when that gentleman will return?

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose that the Senator, as the organ of the Senate on foreign affairs, is informed.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator supposes that I, as the organ of the Senate on foreign affairs, am informed on the subject. I can state that the Secretary informed me that he might be absent some three weeks, and already much of that time has elapsed. He may soon return; but he may not return before the end of the month; and meanwhile shall our participation in this matter be postponed? I have already said that if we are to do anything we must do it promptly.

And now, sir, as to the extent of the obligations assumed by the resolution under consideration, I reminded the Senator that in approving the action of the Secretary of State, we confined our approbation simply to what he reports himself in the document on our tables. We do not go beyond that at all. I do not understand that there is any obligation, direct or indirect, to any future appropriation on this subject. And that brings me to the inquiry with which the Senator began, whether I was instructed with regard to any future proposition that might be brought before the body on this subject. To that I say frankly, I am not. I suggested yesterday that I had understood—I do not know now how I learned it—that there was to be some further proposition. What it is, I know not; I have had no information with regard to it. I feel confident, however, that it can be of no such character as the Senator from Iowa fore shadows.

The Senator suggests that in the arrangements made for the room in Paris the United States are curtailed in the proportion allowed them. I understand that they are allowed much more than they have ever been allowed before at any European exhibition. We may not have as much room as our agriculturists, our mechanics, and our manufacturers may desire, but we have more than we have ever had before; and the question now is, whether the Congress of the United States will take these simple steps in order to help the citizens of the United States to take advantage of the space that is allowed them. I hope, sir, there will be no delay or question. It seems to me it has occupied too much time already.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken if he imagines that I desire to exile the people of the United States from the great congress of nations of which he speaks, or that I am unwilling that they should exhibit such articles of industry or of art as they may choose to exhibit; nor am I unwilling that the Government should lend its encouragement and aid to enable them to make this exhibition. What I do object to is this: I object to allowing the Secretary of State, in the first place, to undertake to do that for Congress which Congress alone can do. What has the Secretary of State done? The Senator cannot tell us. He has applied, as he ought to have done, for information; but the Secretary of State, he tells us, has gone out of the country and has left no record behind him.

Mr. SUMNER. Simply with regard to that agent in New York; that is all.

Mr. GRIMES. That agent in New York has the entire control of the whole matter. What has that agent done? What is he going to do? What is he authorized to do? How much has the Secretary agreed to pay him? All these things are unknown to us, and the Secretary of State has not deemed it of sufficient importance to leave any record in the State Department giving any information upon these important branches of this subject. Now, sir, I conceive that it is in derogation of the character of this body in a time of peace, for I think we are in a time of peace, certainly so far as this exposition is concerned, to allow the Secretary of State to assume the responsibility that he has assumed. When this exposition is not to take place until the year 1867, and when everybody knows that anything that may be sent to that exposition any time before the 1st of January, 1867, no matter what may have been the regulations hitherto established, will be permitted to be exhibited, I say it is in derogation of the character of this body to allow the Secretary of State, in anticipation of the meeting of Congress, more than eighteen months before the exposition is to take place, to assume the prerogatives, the rights, and the privileges that belong exclusively to Congress.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 6; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Riddle, and Trumbull—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cragin, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—10.

So the joint resolution was passed.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion against the United States, introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] is now before the Senate, the pending question being on the motion to refer it to the joint committee on reconstruction, and upon that question the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in the remarks which I propose to submit to the Senate, it is my purpose to consider almost exclusively the question as to the actual condition of the States in which insurrections have heretofore existed; and I take occasion to do it now because I differ materially from the honorable member from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] who spoke so well yesterday in maintaining an opinion opposite to my own, from a desire that that opinion, supported as it was in a very carefully prepared and very able speech, should not be permitted to go to the country a day without an effort at a reply. I feel no reluctance in speaking upon the particular question now because I happen to be a member of the committee of fifteen, because the opinion which I am about to state and to uphold is one which I have entertained from the beginning; not only from the beginning of our recent troubles, but from the earliest period at which I can recollect I had any opinion at all upon the meaning of the Constitution in the particular involved.

I understand the honorable member from Wisconsin to maintain that the effect of the hostilities which we have been carrying on to suppress the insurrection in certain of the States where it has prevailed for some four years is to extinguish altogether the States as such, and to reduce the territory of which those States were composed at the time when the insurrection broke out to the condition of Territories, and to subject the people of those States to be governed under that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to govern the Territories, or upon the ground that they have been conquered by the United States, and that the power to govern is to be implied from the right of conquest when the conquest is completed.

Mr. HOWE. If the honorable Senator is simply stating what he understands to be the effect of my argument, I cannot object to it; but if he understood me to say that the purpose for which we prosecuted this war was to extinguish those States, he misunderstood me.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not so stated. I did not understand the honorable member as saying that the purpose for which the war was prosecuted, but that the result of the prosecution of the war, was to reduce those States to the condition of Territories. It is to that proposition—

Mr. HOWE. If the honorable Senator will pardon me for one moment, my position was not that the result of the prosecution of the war was to reduce those States to Territories, but that they assumed the legal character of Territories by reason of their own acts, independent of the war. They destroyed the State organizations, not we.

Mr. JOHNSON. I so understood you.

Mr. HOWE. And the effect of the war was simply to reduce them to obedience to the United States, to be governed by such instrumentalities as the Constitution has provided.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure I have not misapprehended the Senator. It would have been very difficult for anybody to misapprehend him, for he was exceedingly lucid in everything he said. It may be possible that I may fail to explain what I understand to have been his propositions, and if I should do so in any part of the remarks which I am about to make, I hope the honorable Senator will set me right.

Mr. President, I propose first to inquire, what is the effect of the war itself? Is its successful result to reduce the States to the condition of Territories? I shall then inquire, if that is not its effect, whether that has been produced by any conduct upon the part of the citizens residing within the limits of those States? No member of the Senate, I am sure, is now to learn that there is no power in the Constitution of the United States given to Congress, or any other department of the Government, to declare, or to carry on, a war against any State. The power to declare war, devolved upon Congress by the eighth section of the first article, is a power evidently looking to a war between the United States and a foreign nation. The authority, too, to protect the United States, or a State, by arms against invasion is a power given to Congress for protection against foreign invasion. If there could be any doubt, looking to the character of the Government, that such is the limitation of the war power, that doubt would be removed by the fact that there is in another part of the same section a provision which looks to the carrying on of such a contest as the one in which we have just been engaged. The language of that clause of the section succeeding the one which gives to Congress the authority to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to maintain and equip a navy, is:

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the United States, suppress insurrection," &c.

It was not, therefore, by means of the war power conferred upon Congress by the antecedent clause, giving to Congress the authority to declare war and vesting it with the means adequate to the end designed, that domestic outbreaks among ourselves were to be suppressed. The Convention looked to two contingencies as likely to happen: first, that we might be involved in war with foreign nations; secondly, that we might be involved in domestic troubles. For the one, they conferred upon Congress the war power, strictly speaking; and for the other, the authority to suppress insurrections, not by means of the war power, but by means of force. It was a police power given to Congress as such; not a power under which, by any possible mode in which it could be exercised, any conquest, in the proper sense of that term, was to be achieved; not a power by which there was to be extinguished any existing institution in any one of the States; and, above all, not a power to destroy a State or States.

You will remember, Mr. President, and every member of the Senate who is familiar with the proceedings of the Convention will, I have no doubt, remember, that when it was suggested that Congress should have the authority to make war against a State, the proposition was repudiated as fatal to the Government by two leaders of that body of mighty men, Hamilton and Madison. I have not time to state their reasons, nor to refer to the debates where they are to be found. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that they both denied that, as far as the Convention had proceeded at that time, any such authority was given to Congress, and protested against the propriety of conferring any such power, and it was never conferred.

The power actually given was a power to preserve, not to destroy; a power to maintain, not to extinguish; a power to make the Government what the preamble to the Constitution states to be the purpose of its framers, perpetual; a Government for the security of liberty for themselves and their posterity forever. It would have been an extraordinary anomaly, one that would justly have deprived its authors of the reputation that they now hold in the eyes of the civilized world, if, in forming a Government they designed to be perpetual, they had given it a power to destroy itself. The purpose, then, of the war power, strictly speaking, and of the police power conferred upon Congress by that clause in the eighth section of the first article, was to preserve, and not to destroy; to preserve it if assailed by a foreign foe; to preserve it if assailed by domestic treason or violence.

The proposition is so clear that I should not have deemed it necessary to cite authorities for the purpose of proving it, but that perhaps the observations of the honorable member from Wisconsin may induce some of the Senate, or induce the public, to suppose that there is in the Constitution an authority to carry on a war against a State. The question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases the opinion in which has been very much relied upon as maintaining in part the doctrine for which the honorable member contends; I mean the prize cases. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court in these cases, uses this language:

"By the Constitution Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State, or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. He has no power to initiate or declare war either against a foreign nation or a domestic State. But by the acts of Congress of February 28, 1795, and of March 3, 1807, he is authorized to call out the militia and use the military and naval forces of the United States in case of invasion by foreign nations, and to suppress insurrection against the government of a State or of the United States."

Here, then, is an express denial of the power, either upon the part of Congress, or upon the part of the Executive, to carry on a war against a State, under any clause of the Constitution. The language is plain and positive. "It cannot," says the court—that is Congress cannot—"declare war against a State or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution." And the same doctrine is held by the minority in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson. He says:

"The acts of 1795 and 1807 did not, and could not, under the Constitution, confer on the President the power of declaring war against a State of this Union."

We have, then, the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court that domestic troubles, insurrection, a refusal to obey the Constitution or laws of the United States, or to execute the laws, or to interpose obstacles against the execution of the laws, do not authorize Congress to declare war against the State in which such insurrection may exist, is not a condition of things in which the President has any power to carry on a war by virtue of the war power for the purpose of reinstating the authority of the Government, but, on the contrary, is a state of things to be remedied by means of the police power, which Congress may authorize the use of by empowering the President to call out the militia, or use the Army and Navy of the United States to suppress an existing insurrection when it can be suppressed in no other way.

It would seem, therefore, to follow that when the insurrection is suppressed, when the contingency which requires a resort to the police power is at an end, the continuing use of that power, only conferred to suppress an insurrection, to carry on a war against a State in which there is no insurrection, is a simple absurdity. The design of the authority was to provide exclusively for the exigency, to meet which was the declared object of vesting the power in Congress to suppress insurrection. If the authority of the Government is set at defiance, if the laws cannot be executed by civil process, it is made the duty of Congress to provide other means by which it can be accomplished. It is their province, therefore, to put the President in possession of such means. But there is no more right to exert by force the police power after the insurrection is suppressed than there is to exert it before the insurrection commenced.

Mr. President, if I am right in this—and I do not think I can be mistaken—and there are no other grounds on which the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin might be controverted, it is found to be repudiated by the positive provisions of the Constitution and by the decision of the Supreme Court.

But it is said that although there was no authority to carry on hostilities for the purpose of exterminating the States in which insurrection prevailed, that although that result would not have been attained by the use of force alone, yet that the conduct of the citizens of those States has attained it, and that the States as such are at an end. At an end how? At an end why? At an end because they decided to secede and attempted it? At an end because we have acquired rights over them by conquest which we had not when the rebellion began? Now a word as to the first ground.

The States ceased to exist by virtue of the conduct of their own citizens, is the argument. What conduct, and when had it that effect?

They passed ordinances of secession. Were these valid? Had they any legal operation whatever? Did they take the States whose people had passed such ordinances out of the Union? Did they dissolve the connection to any extent which existed as between those States and the Union by force of the Constitution? If they did, it can only be because the ordinances were valid. The States are out, says the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, because their people determined that they should go out; they are out, because they were so far disloyal as to declare by ordinance that they were out; they are out because they are still disloyal, although the insurrection has been in fact suppressed and the authority of the Government reinstated. Well, if they are, why is that the result? If the ordinances were void, they could not take them out. If the citizens had not a right to be disloyal, their disloyalty could not put them out. If, notwithstanding the ordinances, on the day after they were passed the States were as much in the Union as on the day before they were passed, and if, after the ordinances were adopted and hostilities were being carried on, their citizens had no more right to be disloyal than they had before hostilities commenced, then they are just as much in the Union now as they were before.

Will any member of the Senate seriously maintain, or maintain at all, that the ordinance of secession had any validity whatever? If any member does so hold, the war upon our part has been a great crime; we have been traitors to the obligations we are under to the Constitution, and not those who, exercising the right of secession, have separated themselves from us. But if, as we all hold, and now everybody thinks, the Constitution confers no right of separation, but imposes an obligation upon every citizen in every State, no matter what may be his conduct or the conduct of all his fellow-citizens, as absolute as it does upon every citizen in any other State, then the ordinances of secession were simply void, absolutely void, having no more effect to terminate the connection between those States and the people of those States and the Government of the Union, than if such ordinances had been passed by any people outside of the limits of the United States; and my friend from Wisconsin must admit this view to be correct.

If the ordinances of secession then had no operation, but were legal nullities, how is it that separation is effected by the conduct of the individual citizens? Is not every man who has been engaged in the insurrection, and who has attempted to maintain it by force of arms, a traitor, if we look merely to the language of the Constitution in its definition of treason? Can anybody doubt that? Whether he may be prosecuted for treason now, under the circumstances which have occurred since hostilities commenced, is a grave question which I do not propose to discuss or to express an opinion upon at this time. But, regarding only the single fact that he has been a party to the insurrection and has endeavored to aid and support it by force of arms, I apprehend there is not a member of the Senate who will for a moment question the right of the Government to prosecute him for treason, and that that right is not dependent upon the time at which he may have attempted by force of arms to resist the authority of the Government. If done an hour before hostilities terminated by the surrender of the insurgents, he is just as much a traitor, in the eye of the Constitution, looking alone to the fact that he was so engaged, as he was a traitor who, in the origin of the rebellion, supported it by force of arms. And if this be so, why is it so? Only because he was then, and is still, a citizen of the United States, bound by the Constitution of the United States, under the obligation of the laws of the United States, and because what he has done has been an act violative of the obligations of both, and an act subjecting himself to the consequences of that violation, just as absolutely as my honorable friend (if he will permit me to suppose such a thing possible) would be if he, in his State of Wisconsin, was found in arms resisting the rightful authority of the United States.

Unless I am greatly mistaken this result cannot depend on whether a few or many are in the insurrection. It is insurrection still in the view of the Constitution, and being insurrection attempted to be maintained by force of arms, it is treason, and treason only because, like ourselves who have been here during the whole of the contest, faithful to our allegiance, these erring, misguided men were citizens of the United States, and responsible to all the obligations imposed upon citizens of the United States by the Constitution and laws passed under its authority.

What would be the consequence of the opposite doctrine—I do not mean to say that the honorable member from Wisconsin goes to that extent—but what would be the logical result of the opposite doctrine? The States, according to that doctrine, are out; as such they have ceased to exist; they are not to be recognized by the Constitution at all; they are as absolutely without the Constitution as States as any of the unorganized territories of the United States. If this be so, if this is the effect of what has happened, how are you to get them in? The honorable member goes to the length which I am about to state, if I correctly apprehended him, as I certainly endeavored to do. You are, he contends, to get them in again only by subjecting them first to a territorial government. What does that admit? That they are under no obligation as citizens of a State to obey the Constitution and laws of the United States, that they are under no obligation to take any part in the election of the Executive, in the election of Senators, in the election of members of the House of Representatives. What follows from this? Does this enforce the Constitution and laws? Is this the only manner in which the authority of the Government is to be reinstated? The offense of these citizens was a refusal to participate in the councils of the nation. The proposition is that that very refusal has put them in a condition in which they have no right to participate in such councils, and cannot participate unless we hereafter, at any time when in our judgment we may think proper, give them that right.

Let us see what is to become in the mean time of our laws in other respects. How is your revenue to be collected by any laws now in force? If you impose a direct tax, how is that to be apportioned by any law now in force? The language of the Constitution is that direct taxes are to be apportioned among the States in a certain proportion. Have you not done it pending the insurrection? You passed an act in 1861, from which I am about to read. It was passed on the 5th of August, the rebellion having commenced in April preceding. I rather think my friend to whom I am replying voted for this law. Certainly I can find nothing in the proceedings of the Senate to show that he or any other Senator opposed it; he will correct me if I am wrong. When this law was passed, the result of the conflict, in the apprehension of some, was exceedingly doubtful; those of us who were most confident were somewhat apprehensive. All the conduct of the States or citizens upon which the honorable member now relies for the purpose of showing that these States ceased to exist and are now Territories, they and their citizens, to be governed accordingly, had then occurred. What is the law passed, I believe, by a unanimous vote of this body, and, as far as I know, with like unanimity in the House? It is entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes." Its every section bears upon the question I am discussing, but I have not time to read the whole. I refer particularly to the eighth section, which provides:

"That a direct tax of $20,000,000 be, and is hereby, annually laid upon the United States, and the same shall be, and is hereby, apportioned to the States, respectively, in manner following."

And then it proceeds to state the amount apportioned to each State, and among these items are these:

"To the State of Virginia, nine hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty and two third dollars.

"To the State of North Carolina, five hundred and seventy-six thousand one hundred and ninety-four and two third dollars.

"To the State of South Carolina, three hundred and sixty-three thousand five hundred and seventy and two third dollars.

"To the State of Georgia, five hundred and eighty-four thousand three hundred and sixty seven and one third dollars.

"To the State of Alabama, five hundred and twenty-nine thousand three hundred and thirteen and one third dollars.

"To the State of Mississippi, four hundred and thirteen thousand eighty-four and two third dollars.

"To the State of Louisiana, three hundred and eighty-five thousand eight hundred and eighty-six and two third dollars.

"To the State of Tennessee, six hundred and sixty-nine thousand four hundred and ninety eight dollars.

"To the State of Arkansas, two hundred and sixty-one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six dollars.

"To the State of Florida, seventy-seven thousand five hundred and twenty-two and two third dollars.

"To the State of Texas, three hundred and fifty-five thousand one hundred and six and two third dollars."

Making an aggregate of between five and six million dollars as the proportions of these States of the $20,000,000 which you proposed to raise by this law. Look to the Constitution of the United States and you find that you had no authority to make that apportionment except upon the theory that these States were then States of the Union. The honorable member tells us now that Virginia is out, and that each of the other named States are out, and have no existence. If she and the rest of them do not exist now they had no existence then; and on the other hand, if they were within the Union then, they are for the same reason within the Union now. After the law passed it was found somewhat difficult to enforce the collection of that portion of the $20,000,000 allotted to States actually in rebellion, and Congress deemed it necessary to pass a supplementary act, to which I also invite the attention of the Senate. It is the act of June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes." The first section provides:

"That when in any State or Territory, or in any portion of any State or Territory, by reason of insurrection or rebellion, the civil authority of the Government of the United States is obstructed so that the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1861, for assessing, levying, and collecting the direct taxes therein mentioned, cannot be peaceably executed, the said direct taxes, by said act apportioned among the several States and Territories, respectively, shall be apportioned and charged in each State and Territory, or part thereof, wherein the civil authority is thus obstructed, upon all the lands and lots of ground situate therein, respectively."

It then provides that each tract of land in those States—not Territories—shall be liable for its proportion of the tax, and commissioners are to be appointed to collect the tax as fast as our armies make their progress. Just as the insurrection is quelled, whether it be in whole or in part, in any one State, the operation of the law commences through the civil means furnished by the laws; and in the interim, to guard against the contingency that there may be sales of the lands, which it may be necessary to the Government to dispose of in order to realize the tax, the law provides that the amount of the tax apportioned by the act of 1861 shall be considered as a lien upon all the land in these very States, as States, which the honorable member from Wisconsin would have us believe, as no doubt he believes, are now out of the Union, and not States at all. Did he not vote for the act of 1862? I have no doubt he did. Was there any member of this body who called in question the right of Congress to pass that act? And yet the act assumes—and there is no power to pass it except on the correctness of that assumption—that they are still States bound to pay their proportion of the taxes for the support of the Government and to carry on the war, and will be States when the insurrection is suppressed.

I refer to these two acts, and there are a great many others that I might cite with the same view, for the purpose of proving that, in the view of Congress, and in the view of the honorable member from Wisconsin himself at the time he gave his assent to these two acts, the States were in and not out of the Union, were living and not dead States, or States that could die. But this fact is further established by the very first act that was passed for the purpose of carrying on the war, the act of July 13, 1861, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes." It provides that where the President finds it impossible to collect the revenue from imports in the ports of any of the States in insurrection, he may do it elsewhere—in some locality in the particular State where the insurrection does not extend; or, if the insurrection is commensurate with the entire State, then he is to collect it on shipboard, or to close the ports of such State, and to subject any foreign vessel attempting to enter such a port, after notice of its having been closed by the President under authority of the act, to condemnation as prize of war. These provisions are absolutely inconsistent with the idea of the honorable member from Wisconsin, as I think; but there is something else in that act that is even more inconsistent. What view did Congress take of the character of the insurrection at the time it passed the act of July 13, 1861? The language of the fifth section of that act is:

"That whenever the President, in pursuance of the provisions of the second section of the act entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose,' approved February 28, 1795, shall have called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which said combination exists, nor such insurrection suppressed by said State or States, then and in such case—"

That is, the case of an insurrection existing and not suppressed—

"it may and shall be lawful for the President, by proclamation, to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful."

How long? Till Congress shall legislate? No, Mr. President; but "shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue;" in other words, as long as the insurrection continues. That ended, the use of the militia and the use of the Army of the United States to bring about that end is to terminate.

And what said the President of the United States? I am not aware that any member of the Senate questioned the legality of any proclamation issued by President Lincoln on this subject, or questioned either whether he had not gone to the whole extent of the power devolved upon him by the section of the act of 1861 which I have just quoted. And what did he proclaim? His proclamation of April 15, 1861, began thus:

"Whereas the laws of the United States have been for some time past and now are opposed and the execution thereof obstructed in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by law."

In his proclamation of April 19, 1861, he recites:

"Whereas an insurrection against the Government of the United States has broken out in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and the laws of the United States for the collection of the revenue cannot be effectually executed therein conformable to that provision of the Constitution which requires duties to be uniform throughout the United States: and whereas a combination of persons, engaged in such insurrection, have threatened to grant pretended letters of marque to authorize the bearers thereof to commit assaults on the lives, vessels, and property of good citizens of the country lawfully engaged in commerce on the high seas, and in waters of the United States; and whereas an executive proclamation has been already issued, requiring the persons engaged in these disorderly proceedings to desist therefrom, calling out a militia force for the purpose of repressing the same, and convening Congress in extraordinary session to deliberate and determine thereon:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, with a view to the same purposes before mentioned, and to the protection of the public peace, and the lives and property of quiet and orderly citizens pursuing their lawful occupations, until Congress shall have assembled and deliberated on the said unlawful proceedings, or until the same shall have ceased, have further deemed it advisable to set on foot a blockade of the ports within the States aforesaid, in pursuance of the laws of the United States and of the law of nations in such case provided."

In the proclamation of April 27, 1861, he announces that, by the previous proclamation of the 19th, a blockade of the ports of certain States was ordered to be established, and adds:

"And whereas since that date public property of the United States has been seized, the collection of the revenue obstructed, and duly commissioned officers of the United States while engaged in executing the orders of their superiors have been arrested and held in custody as prisoners, or have been impeded in the discharge of their official duties without due legal process by persons claiming to act under authorities of the States of Virginia and North Carolina:

"An efficient blockade of the ports of those States will also be established."

In the proclamation of August 12, 1861, he states that a joint committee of both Houses of Congress had requested him to recommend a day of public humiliation, fasting, and prayer, and he proceeds to do so, and to state the objects for which prayer should be offered, namely, "for the reestablishment of law, order, and peace throughout the whole extent of our country."

You authorize him to invoke, and he invokes the merciful interference of Heaven to make us again what we were before—States united under one form of Government, with the same powers adequate to make us a nation prosperous and powerful. You tell him to go to Heaven's throne and implore Heaven's interposition to restore us to the condition in which we were before the rebellion, to pray that "our arms may, be blessed and made effectual for the reestablishment of law, order, and peace throughout the wide extent of our country." No invocation to bless only a part of our land and leave the other out of His benediction.

You tell him to issue a proclamation invoking the blessings of God upon the entire country, not for the purpose merely of bringing about individual happiness, but for the purpose of bringing about what existed before under the Constitution of the United States—peace and order, a recognition of the authority of the Government and of the authority of the laws. Yet, according to the theory of the honorable member from Wisconsin, at that very time the work had been accomplished which the proclamation sought to prevent. The proclamation, pursuing your own authority, prays God to make our arms successful to the end of restoring peace and order everywhere in all the States. The honorable member's theory is that there was a large portion of the country, territorially including what were eleven States before, which cannot be restored by any blessings on the arms of the United States. Whether they were ever to have the benefit of the Constitution, or when they were to have it, or to what extent they were to have it, according to his theory, is to depend upon the discretion of Congress.

Again, what has the Government done with your knowledge? Have they not, just as we have succeeded in getting the authority of the United States reinstated in the ports of the United States, or territorially within the States, extended the revenue laws? Do you not collect duties in New Orleans, in Charleston, in Savannah, in Texas? How do you do this? Under what authority? Under the authority of antecedent laws, which give it only in relation to the ports of States; and yet, according to the honorable member's doctrine, all those ports were not ports of States of this Union at the time when the Executive, with the knowledge of Congress and his individual knowledge, undertook to collect duties and to enforce the execution of the impost acts and acts for the collection of internal revenue. What was the subject of the debate this morning? The honorable member from Massachusetts, who, I believe, was the first to broach in the Senate the doctrine that the States were extinct—a doctrine not then received, as I remember, with unanimous approbation by this body as far as any opinion was expressed on the subject—that honorable gentleman himself, this morning, finding fault as he thought was his duty, with the manner in which the Secretary of the Treasury was discharging his duty of collecting the revenue in the States in which the insurrection did prevail, found no fault with his attempt to collect the revenue. It was only as to the manner of collecting; it was his failure to administer the oath to the assessors whom he has appointed for that purpose. He recognizes, therefore, the duty of the Secretary to collect revenue in South Carolina and in Louisiana? Why? Under what laws? Laws passed by you extending the revenue system to the Territories of the United States, or laws having no force whatever in that particular, except upon the theory that the States, notwithstanding the insurrection, remained and were States of the Union? You are selling lands there now on that theory; I suppose I am guilty of no want of propriety in saying that that subject has been in part before the Committee on the Judiciary. General Sherman, by an order passed after he reached Georgia and South Carolina, set apart a large portion of the territory of those two States for the freedmen. By the order, the most valuable portion of South Carolina was embraced—that portion in which the Sea Island cotton is made. There are no such lands there now to be acted on by that order. Why? Because you have sold them to meet South Carolina's proportion of the direct tax; you have sold them to meet the proportion due by the individual citizens of that State to whom they belonged. Where did you get that authority? Under the antecedent law; and that law was passed on the theory that the States were still in and could not be got out; and that law is now being executed upon the theory that they are in, that each State, as well as every individual member of each State, is just as responsible to pay the tax which the Government may from time to time impose, as he or it was before the insurrection commenced.

But that is not all. The Senate, and I suppose my friend from Wisconsin acted with the rest of the Senate in that respect, has confirmed nominations of judges and district attorneys and marshals for these very States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. For certain "districts."

Mr. JOHNSON. Districts of the States. They are all out according to the theory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the districts may exist.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; but then I suppose if you appoint district judges in all the districts which may be within a State it is the same as appointing them for the State itself. Still, you extend the judiciary system of the United States to these States in part or in whole; that my friend from Maine will of course admit. Under what authority? Under the authority of your antecedent legislation. The Constitution of the United States creates no courts, no marshals, no district attorneys: that is done by legislation; and you legislated upon the subject of constituting courts and bringing into existence the particular officers and making it the duty of the Executive to appoint whenever a vacancy from any cause should exist. What right has a district judge in South Carolina—I believe there is but one district in that State—to hold his office? What authority had you to confer it? If South Carolina was a Territory, then, as the Supreme Court have decided in the case of Canter vs. The American Insurance Company, the judicial system of the United States did not extend to it. The territorial judges may be appointed for a time. The judicial tenure which the framers of the Constitution were so anxious to make permanent, so as to make the incumbents independent of legislative or executive control or influence, is not considered as applying to courts that may be created by Congress within the Territories, and the judges of those courts may therefore, it is said, be dismissed at any time. Such has, in fact, been the practice of the Government. They may be appointed for a term of years, and dismissed as any other civil officer of the Government by the Executive. Does my honorable friend from Wisconsin suppose that the judges in those insurrectionary States can be dismissed? Will he for a moment maintain that their tenure is not an independent one, that they do not hold office during good behavior? I presume not; and if not, why not? Because they constitute a part of the judiciary of the United States as created by the Constitution, and are no such part of the judicial system of the United States in those States except upon the theory that those States are now States of the Union.

Further, you have done more than this. You passed an act some two or three years ago creating an additional judicial circuit, making Oregon and California the tenth circuit of the United States. The act of 1802 (I have not time to turn to it) makes it the duty of the judges of the Supreme Court whenever any chief justice shall thereafter be appointed or any associate justice, to make an allotment of circuits. What has been done (and you are presumed to have known what was done) by the members of the Supreme Court, and who, too, it may be supposed, have some reasonably correct view of the Constitution of the United States? Here is an order passed by them at their session of December term, 1862:

"There having been"—

says the order—I read from it—

"two associate justices of this court appointed since its last session, it is "Ordered, That the following allotment be made of the Chief Justice and associate justices of said court among the circuits, agreeably to the act of Congress in such cases made and provided"—

That is, the act of 1802—

"and that such allotment be entered of record, to wit: for the first circuit, Nathan Clifford; for the second circuit, Samuel Nelson; for the third circuit, Robert C. Grier; for the fourth circuit, Roger B. Taney; for the fifth circuit, James M. Wayne; for the sixth circuit, John Catron; for the seventh circuit, Noah H. Swayne; for the eighth circuit, David Davis; for the ninth circuit, Samuel F. Miller; for the tenth circuit, Stephen J. Field."

Do you know what States are in these several circuits? I suppose some of the Senators do not. Bear in mind the exact dimensions of these several circuits. The fourth circuit contains Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and West Virginia. By that order the then Chief Justice was allotted to that circuit. No two States were then more absolutely in rebellion than Virginia and North Carolina. The fifth circuit consists of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, every one in a state of insurrection, and to that Mr. Justice Wayne was allotted. The sixth circuit consists of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee; all except Kentucky at that time in rebellion. To that the late Justice Catron was allotted.

The late Chief Justice afterward died, and the present chief was appointed. The contingency again arose when it was necessary to make a new allotment, and that Chief Justice himself takes part in that allotment. Does he consider these States as at an end? An order passed by the court at the session of December, 1865, by which the fourth circuit, consisting of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and West Virginia, was allotted to Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase; the fifth circuit, consisting of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, all lately in insurrection, was allotted to Mr. Justice Wayne. The sixth circuit is now vacant, no successor having been appointed to Mr. Justice Catron.

Thus the Senate see that the judges of the Supreme Court by a unanimous order passed in the execution of the statute of 1802, the contingency having occurred which rendered it necessary that they should discharge the duty imposed upon them, have thought themselves bound to consider all of these States as still States of the Union, and have, as among themselves, divided out these States as composing the circuits to which the respective judges are to be allotted.

Mr. President, it would be fatiguing the Senate, however it may be desirable, perhaps, in order that the country may be informed, to refer to all the proceedings of the Legislature and the Executive and the Judiciary to show that in the opinion of each department these States are considered as existing States, and in the Union as such. All that I further propose to do on this occasion is to call the attention of the Senate to a passage or two in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the prize cases, and to some general remarks as to the authority of the United States to bring about the end which the honorable member supposes has been brought about by the hostilities or in consequence of the hostilities.

A passage in the opinion of the court in those cases has been over and over again relied upon in this Chamber and elsewhere as maintaining the doctrine that whatever may be accomplished by war in the case of an international war, has been accomplished by means of the hostilities which we have been carrying on in these States, and consequently that whatever rights are incident to a state of war, and may be acquired by either of the belligerents in an international war, are incident to and might be acquired by the United States in the hostilities which the United States has carried on; and that as one of those rights is to obtain title by conquest that title may be obtained in our case by the United States as well as if the war had been an international one. Now, before I take up the case, permit me to change the order in which I propose to consider it, and let me state the proposition so that I may very fairly try conclusions with my friend from Wisconsin.

Supposing him to maintain the doctrine which I am about to state, (he does it, as I think, necessarily, as one of the results of his view, if he does not do it in terms,) we have obtained, says the honorable member, as one of the consequences of the war, some right that we had not before. What is that? A right to legislate for the people and for the territory within the States that have been in insurrection as people of Territories and as Territories. We have got that how? By the result of the war. What result of the war? Because of the victory which we have achieved over the rebellion. We have won it by force of arms; we are the conquerors, they are the conquered. We, therefore, by virtue of the conquest, have a right over the territory of these States which we did not before possess. We have an authority over the citizens of those States which we did not before possess. Conquered! In the first place we are to consider what authority is there in the Constitution of the United States which gives to the General Government—if there shall be enough left of that Government to accomplish it—the right to conquer the States. I have, in a measure anticipated the argument. The authority delegated is an authority not to conquer people or territory, but to conquer in the name of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and thereby, by force of such conquest, to be able to hold them up and declare to the insurgents, "This is your Constitution and your laws, and you are bound by them as you were before you attempted to resist their authority."

Can anybody doubt that? We went into the conflict to maintain both the Constitution and the laws. What gave rise to the conflict? What was the conflict? Are the States and the people of the States in or out of the Union? We have tried that question by ordeal of battle. What has been the result? Have the insurgents succeeded, or have we succeeded? They wanted to get out of the Union; we wanted to retain them in the Union. That was the issue between us. We said that, notwithstanding their acts of secession and hostility, they were still States, and their citizens were bound to obey the Constitution and laws of the United States. They said they were not States of the Union, and that their citizens were not bound by the Constitution and laws of the Union. The struggle has been made, the issue has been tried, the verdict has been rendered, and it is in our favor. Success is ours. Well, success how? Succeeded to what extent? Succeeded in keeping in the Union men who were endeavoring by force of arms to escape from the Union.

The proposition of the honorable member is that we have succeeded only in part; we have put down the insurrection, but we have lost the States to retain which was our object in carrying on the conflict. If so, it can be hardly called a victory at all. Preservation was the purpose; preservation was the duty; the countless lives that have been lost, and the still more countless treasure that has been expended, have served, to be sure, the purpose of putting down forcible resistance to the execution of the Constitution and the laws, but leave the Union a Union only of some twenty-one States instead of thirty-three or thirty-four. The victory, according to that theory, is but half achieved; the object is but half accomplished. We wanted to bring them where they were when they started. They said they would not return to where they were when they started. We have put it out of their power to take themselves out of the Union individually, but we have not been able to retain the States. They are hopelessly, absolutely gone, according to the theory of the honorable member. Can that be so, Mr. President? Is it possible that it can be so? If it be, I am by no means prepared to say that the object accomplished compensates at all for the sacrifices which have been made to accomplish it—a dissevered Union, brought about, not by our consent; we protested against it; but if the honorable member is right in his theory, brought about because we could not prevent it. Practically, he comes to the same conclusion that the former President of the United States came to, as announced in the message which he sent to Congress announcing the existence of the insurrection, that there was no right to secede, but that there was no authority in the Government to prevent it. It makes very little difference whether the want of authority is acknowledged as a want apparent in the Constitution, or whether it is maintained as a fact which cannot be avoided if the insurgents think proper to carry on the war for any length of time—not to be avoided if they pursue a certain course of conduct. Now, Mr. President, what difference in principle does it make as far as concerns the question which I am now discussing, whether there are twenty-one States resolved upon standing by the Government and eleven only in hostility against it, or whether there be eleven who stand by it and twenty-one against it, and the eleven succeed?

Massachusetts and Virginia, perhaps, at one period in the history of the Government, might by uniting their forces have escaped the obligations of the Union. The States upon whose shoulders rested for support the arms of Washington, during the revolutionary struggle, were then all-powerful; and one of those States would have been perhaps the most powerful State now in the Union but for the existence of involuntary servitude. I mean Virginia. If the remaining States had thought proper to resist it, those two States might by their physical power and patriotism have put down the insurrection; and, according to the theory of the honorable member, then the Union, which our fathers thought consisted of thirteen States, the States that had carried us successfully through the revolutionary struggle, would be reduced to two. What sort of a Congress would you have? Two Senators from Massachusetts and two Senators from Virginia, and a larger number in the other House. Do you think that would be a constitutional condition of things?

Mr. HOWE. What is the clause of the Constitution which condemns it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Condemns what?

Mr. HOWE. Condemns that state of things in the case supposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no particular clause condemning it, because, I was about to say, no man in the Convention ever thought that such a proposition would be contended for.

Mr. HOWE. I presume not.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not provided against in express terms, but it is provided against by the whole spirit of the Constitution. The Government formed by the Constitution cannot exist unless the States are represented. The theory of the honorable member would, in the case I have supposed, constitute Virginia and Massachusetts despots, armed with the power of doing whatever they might think proper toward the other States or the citizens within those States.

But again the honorable member says that conquest extinguishes these States, or that what has been done extinguishes them. Does the honorable member recollect what the decision of the Supreme Court was in the case of the United States vs. Rice, reported in 4 Wheaton? I have no doubt his memory can easily be refreshed when I call his attention to the case. The honorable member told us yesterday that he could not imagine a State suspended that could be revived without some congressional legislation. Suspension in such a case, according to him, is death. The case to which I allude presented this question: during the war of 1812, sometime in 1814, the British obtained the undisputed possession of Castine and of the territory of Maine lying on the other side, a territory, I believe, constituting about one third of that State. From the time they got possession up to the ratification of the treaty of peace of February, 1815, they had undisputed possession; the authority of the United States was gone for a time; the authority of Maine was gone for a time. Is that part of the State of Maine out of the Union now? I do not think my friend whom I see, one of the Senators from the State of Maine, would admit that. I rather presume that he thinks that Castine is a part of the State of Maine, and he thinks that all the rest of the territory of that State that came into the actual physical possession, by force of arms, of Great Britain in 1814, and remained there until the ratification of peace in 1815, still is a part of the State of Maine. But what was it in the interval? Dead, if my friend from Wisconsin is right now as to the effect of State suspension; dead, because the authority of the State and the authority of the United States during the whole of that period was suspended. This is not my own word; it is the word of the Supreme Court itself. The decision arose out of this state of facts: while the port was in the exclusive military possession of England a cargo was imported, and England imposed, herself, upon the cargo whatever duties she thought proper to exact. The cargo was landed, the English duty paid. The authority of the United States afterward was reinstated. The collector of the United States insisted upon the importer paying the duty which the cargo would have been liable to under the laws of the United States if Castine had been in the possession of the United States at the time of the importation, and he made him give a bond for the payment of such duty. The case was tried, and the Supreme Court by a unanimous decision decided that the bond was void. Now, how came they to decide so? I will read a few sentences from the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, in 4 Wheaton, page 253. He says:

"The single question arising on the pleadings in this case is, whether goods imported into Castine during its occupation by the enemy are liable to the duties imposed by the revenue laws upon goods imported into the United States. It appears, by the pleadings, that on the 1st day of September, 1814, Castine was captured by the enemy, and remained in his exclusive possession, under the command and control of his military and naval forces, until after the ratification of the treaty of peace, in February, 1815. During this period the British Government exercised all civil and military authority over the place, and established a custom-house, and admitted goods to be imported, according to regulations prescribed by itself, and, among others, admitted the goods upon which duties are now demanded. These goods remained at Castine until after it was evacuated by the enemy; and upon the reestablishment of the American Government, the collector of the customs, claiming a right to American duties on the goods, took the bond in question from the defendant for the security of them.

"Under these circumstances, we are all of opinion that the claim for duties cannot be sustained. By the conquest and military occupation of Castine the enemy acquired that firm possession which enabled him to exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over that place."

That is, as long as it continued. Now he goes on to say how long it continued:

"The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was of course suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there, or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors."

"The subsequent evacuation by the enemy, and resumption of authority by the United States, did not, and could not, change the character of the previous transaction."

Did anybody suggest that before the authority of the United States, after the British evacuated Castine, could be reinstated it was necessary for Congress to legislate? Did anybody suggest that the suspension of the authority of the United States during the period of the possession of Castine by the enemy operated to put an end to the authority of the United States, and so completely that it could not be reestablished except by subsequent legislation? Unquestionably not. The moment the place was abandoned the authority of the United States became reinstated proprio vigore.

Now, to apply it to the case under consideration, the effect of the occupation of Castine was, according to the language of the court, to suspend the Constitution and laws, and the authority of both, within the limits of that possession. The possession terminates, and the court say that upon the termination of that military exclusive possession the authority of the United States is revived at once without any legislation. It never occurred to the court or to anybody else, and my friend will look in vain at the statute-book for the purpose of showing that there was any legislation extending again the revenue laws of the United States to the port of Castine. It revived just as animal life revives in certain cases after temporary suspension.

Suspension, then, according to the doctrine of the Supreme Court, is not what the honorable member from Wisconsin supposes suspension to be; it is not death: it is temporary paralysis of which the cure becomes absolute and effectual by removing the cause of that temporary paralysis, and that ended, the States stand as they stood before the disease assailed them: they stand perfect, with all the health of living and vital and powerful States, and entitled to the benefits of the Constitution and the laws, for the same reason that the people of Castine and that part of the territory of Maine which was held for a time by the armies of England became at once by the termination of that possession reinstated in all the rights which belonged to Castine and that part of Maine before its possession by the enemy.

We hear of the right of conquest. What is to be conquered? Only what you have a right to demand. And what have you in such a case as this a right to demand? Submission to the authority of the Government, and that you have got. To maintain that, under the authority to enforce by force of arms submission to the authority of the Government you can destroy the States, is to say that Government can accomplish that by arms which it has no right to raise an arm to accomplish.

There are many other observations, Mr. President, with which I might trouble the Senate, and may perhaps do so at some future day and on some other question; but I have said as much and more than I intended when I rose. I conclude, therefore, with saying and with hoping, as I think every patriotic man in the country does hope, that our ancient harmony will be restored; that our ancient Union of States, as they existed when the insurrection commenced, will be reinstated; that we shall forgive and try to forget the horrors through which we have passed during the last five years; that we shall come together as a band of brothers, and present to the nations of the world a Government in which there is an actual union of obligation and of hearts sufficient to protect us against foreign foes, powerful enough and willing and resolved to guard against all perils to its continuing existence arising from insurrection at home, and capable of making us one of the freest and most prosperous and most renowned nations upon the face of the earth.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, having occupied so much of the time of the Senate yesterday I should not feel authorized to claim a moment of its time to-day, but for the fact that the honorable Senator from Maryland has in many very important particulars, as I think, entirely misconceived the scope and force of the opinions I expressed to the Senate yesterday.

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. HOWE.) You can go on to-morrow; let us adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senate desires to adjourn I have no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PAY OF MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 2, 1865, a report of all fines and deductions from the pay of contractors during the year ending June 30, 1865, for failures to deliver the mails; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the law passed at the last session, this communication will not be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented the credentials of James Farrow and John D. Kennedy, claiming seats as Representatives from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that one of those documents be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

By his Excellency James L. Orr, Governor and commander-in-chief in and over the State aforesaid, to James Farrow:

Whereas in pursuance of an ordinance of the people of this State, entitled "An ordinance to divide the State into four congressional districts," ratified the 27th day of September, A. D. 1865, and also in pursuance of joint resolutions of the General Assembly of this State providing for the election of four members of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States for this State, passed the 31st day of October, A. D. 1865, an election has been held for a Representative in the Congress of the United States, to represent the fourth congressional district in this State, composed of the judicial districts of Anderson, Pickens, Greenville, Laurens, Spartanburg, Union, York, and Chester; and upon examination of the returns which have been received, it appears that you, the said James Farrow, have been duly elected by a majority of votes to represent the same:

I do therefore, by virtue of the powers in me vested, commission you, the said James Farrow, to represent the people of this State as a member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States of America, for two years from the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the State, in the city of Columbia, this 1st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1865, and in the ninetieth year of the independence of the United States of America.

JAMES L. ORR.

By the Governor:

WILLIAM R. HUNTT, Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be referred, under the rule, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House requesting information relative to the appointment, if any, of a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, to award compensation pursuant to the twenty-fourth section of the act of February 24, 1864, to loyal persons to whom colored volunteers may have owed service.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that this communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The communication, with the accompanying papers, will be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise to a question of privilege. I find, on looking over the Globe of yesterday, that a very absurd sentence has, through some inadvertence, been put in my mouth as having been uttered during the colloquial debate that occurred between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] and myself on Tuesday last. I would not notice the matter but for the fact that I am represented as asserting a principle the very contrary of that for which I was contending. In speaking of the ordinances of secession I am made to say, "I consider all those States that passed ordinances of secession as dead to this Government." That, of course, is not my position. It places me in an attitude entirely opposite to that which I assumed.

I had no opportunity to look over the report of those remarks which were made by me in the course of the speech of my friend from Ohio, but I would have been very glad if he had stricken out that sentence, as I have no doubt that he would have done if he had observed it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not read that part of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that corrections of the Globe are not questions of privilege, but are in the nature of personal explanations, although the Chair always hears them, unless objection is made.

CHARLOTTE BENCE.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 33) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry.

The report accompanying the bill, which was read, states that Captain Bence, while in the military service of the United States, was on the 12th of October, 1864, killed by guerrillas from Missouri, he being at that time at his home in Davis county, Iowa, on leave of absence. The committee recommend that the bill be passed with the following amendment:

Strike out the words "from the 1st day of October, 1864," and insert in lieu thereof the words "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The Clerk read, as follows:

PENSION OFFICE, December 13, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to report in regard to the case of Mrs. Charlotte Bence. In my judgment her case was properly rejected, her husband having been killed while he was at home on furlough, and consequently not on duty as a soldier. Under the circumstances of the case, however, I think the case one that should receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Very truly yours,

JOSEPH H. BARRETT, Commissioner.

Hon. J. F. WILSON, M. C.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a remark in regard to the amendment reported by the committee. I think that does injustice to this claimant. If her husband had been killed in battle of course the commencement of her pension would have been prior to the date fixed by the proposed amendment. I think it nothing more than justice to this widow that her pension should begin at the time fixed by the original bill. That is all I desire to say; and I think that the case appeals to the House as one of great hardship not to permit this widow's pension to commence at the date fixed by the amendment of the committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Was that at the date of her husband's death?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, subsequent to the date of his death.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have the bill and amendment again read.

The Clerk again read the bill and amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am informed by the gentleman who reported the bill that I am mistaken in the date of the bill being subsequent to the death of the husband of the claimant; and I move an amendment to the amendment of the committee, fixing the time at the 1st of January, 1865, which I am satisfied would be at least two months subsequent to the day of his death.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered this matter with reference to all of the cases which may be presented to this House and that committee for pensions by virtue of special facts. It will be observed that this case does not come within the law. It is outside of the pension law. It is not provided for, and hence has been rejected at the Pension Office. These cases will not only come in at this session in large numbers, but will the next session, and perhaps for the next fifty years. And if the House establishes a precedent in this case, it will be one which will be followed in all subsequent cases.

Taking the ground that the law is just in its provisions, this party comes here and asks for a gratuity from Congress. Perhaps the merits of this case deserve special consideration; yet, in the eye of the law, this is a mere gratuity to be granted to this party. The committee could not consent to establish a precedent that the pension should commence at the death of the party in these cases, to be followed in all those which may come hereafter. We think it is as much as this party can reasonably ask, or any other party outside of the law, that the pension shall commence at the date of the passage of the act. The committee report it in this case, and will report it in every case which shall be reported upon during the present Congress.

This has been properly considered; it has been looked upon in all of its bearings. The demands upon the Treasury are great, and we trust that the House will not constitute such a precedent, to be followed for years and years, that the pension shall commence at the time of the death of the party. If we do it now we have to do it for fifty years to come. If it is just in this case it will be just in every other case for fifty years from now. In the eye of the law it is not just, because the law has not provided for it. We are therefore giving this as a gratuity.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think, Mr. Speaker, that my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is wrong, and that the principle advocated by the committee is a just one, that the pension should commence from the passage of the act. And I am glad to hear the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. [Mr. BENJAMIN,] that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, one of the most important committees of this House, have determined to adhere to that principle in all the cases which they shall report; and I trust that we shall follow that decision in this and all similar cases.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I might be permitted to say that I believe a more just rule than the one mentioned by the member of the committee that reported this bill, or perhaps than the one suggested by myself—that was from the day of the death—a more just rule, I believe, would be to have the pension commence from the date of the claim when presented to Congress. These claims may be deferred from Congress to Congress for years, as has been the case with revolutionary claims and claims of the war of 1812; and if the claim be a just one it seems to me that there should be no withholding from the party by reason of the failure of Congress to act, and that the money should be paid from the time the application is made to Congress. I make the suggestion in the hope that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will adopt that as an amendment to the amendment, instead of that arbitrary date, the 1st of January. If my friend will so change it that it shall run from the time the application was made to Congress for a pension, I believe that will be accepted as a substitute by this House.

Mr. KASSON. Would the gentleman like the same rule to be applied in case of other claimants upon the justice of Congress? We have never allowed interest on the recognition of a claim, however long it has been before Congress. The principle which he proposes to apply would also cover that case, being a neglect of Congress to pay the money promptly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I answer that Congress shall withhold, so far as my vote is concerned, not one single cent due to a man, woman, or child on the face of the earth, by reason of neglect to act promptly, and that if it is right to pay a claim it is right to pay the interest accruing thereon from whatever time it should be paid. I lay this down as a rule, not only in this but in subsequent cases, that if Congress is pressed with more important considerations, and we defer these claims of widows and orphans from Congress to Congress, though it may be for twenty or twenty-five years, when we do settle with the claimants, we should pay every cent that is due, with interest thereon, if it be just; at any rate pay the principal from the date of the claim.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move the previous question.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will do so.

Mr. CONKLING. I should agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] if these cases presented instances in which anything is "due" by law to any one, but such a bill is here only because nothing is "due." In other words, they are all cases addressing themselves to the sound discretion of Congress, and are based upon facts constituting exceptions to the law. Some general rule, sound in reason and in fact, may therefore be properly established in such cases as to the time when such stipends shall begin. If I mistake not, speaking of at least two Congresses in which I served, the sense of the House was, that the rule suggested by the committee in this case is a sound and just one. Its advantage is, for one thing, that we may always know what it is for which we vote, and how much we are voting away, which we could not so well appreciate if the act was to take effect at some time back which may be itself the subject of dispute.

There is force in the suggestion that one claim may run a long time before it is acted upon, and that in another case earlier action may take place; nevertheless it seems to me no fairer rule can be established than to assume that each case will be passed as diligently, with regard to merits and urgency, as possible; and that if exceptional pensions run from the date of the act, as fair and judicious a rule will be established as could possibly prevail. Therefore I hope the principle laid down by the committee will be adhered to, and that we shall not capriciously say in one case that the time of a pension shall be fixed in one way, and in another case in a different way, but rather that we shall agree that in all cases the pensions, given by a special act, shall commence only with the passage of the statute; and I am inclined to think in the end we shall find that the total of these claims will be great enough even in that event.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This is said to be an exceptional claim. Is it the fault of the widow or the fault of the law that it is an exceptional case?

Mr. CONKLING. Not the fault of either. There is no fault in the case. On the contrary, we all understand that the imperfection of general laws is such that many most meritorious cases must be skipped by every general system. Nevertheless we know, too, that we should observe some uniformity in these cases, and the best uniformity I know of is the one suggested by the committee.

One further remark, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. I will go as far as any one can properly go in making those who have served in the war and the mourners for those who have served in the war recipients of all benefits we have a right to dispense. I feel, however, that nothing is more obligatory upon us than the duty to economize and retrench the expenses of the Government. I admit and maintain that an exception to this, if there be an exception, arises in the case of soldiers and the families of soldiers. For them we should go as far as possible. Nevertheless, regard should be had to some principle which shall limit as far as may be the outgo from the Treasury, and it seems to me no limit can be established, no rule can be adopted, at once so uniform and so just to all concerned, as that suggested by the committee. It has worked well heretofore, and was established after careful consideration. I hope the House will not depart from it now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would like very much to accommodate the gentleman, but I think this question is fully understood.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was rejected.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I was absent in the committee-room when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have two bills from the Senate taken from the Speaker's table and referred to that committee.

No objection was made.

COMMANDERS REYNOLDS AND WOOLSEY.

Joint resolution of the Senate No. 2, for the restoration of Commanders William Reynolds and Melancton B. Woolsey, United States Navy, to the active list from the reserved list, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PENSION LAW.

Bill of the Senate No. 29, to amend section five of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,'" approved July 4, 1864, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Captain Jethro Bonney; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of papers in the same case; and they were referred to the Committee of Claims.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. VANAERNAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

The petition of John Drout, of Winterport, Maine, for arrears of pension; and

The petition of the widow of Brigadier General Schimmelpenninck, praying for a pension on account of the services of her late husband.

PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report for the consideration of this House the aggregate amount of money appropriated and expended upon the establishment of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, from its foundation to the present time, including, under their respective heads, the cost of site and additions thereto, the expense of shops, docks, buildings, machinery, and walls, dredging and piling, and all the items which pertain to its establishment as distinguished from its current and civil expenses.

The SPEAKER. This being a resolution calling for executive information, it requires unanimous consent for its consideration to-day.

Mr. THAYER. I will not object if the gentleman will accept an amendment to include in the inquiry also the present estimated value of the property.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury has any information on that subject.

Mr. THAYER. I suppose he can give it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Allow me to state in explanation that there is a proposition before the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of selling the present site of the navy-yard at Philadelphia for the purpose of establishing a new yard at League Island.

This resolution merely directs the Secretary of the Treasury to report, for the information of the House and of that committee, the whole expenditure of the Government upon the present yard at Philadelphia. It is merely a resolution of inquiry for the information of the committee.

Mr. THAYER. I do not suppose the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will have any objection to the modification I have suggested. Otherwise I must object to the introduction of this resolution at this time.

Mr. STROUSE. I desire to move an amendment to this resolution, so as to call for information as to the number and character of the ships built there.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STROUSE] who last spoke evidently misapprehends the scope of the resolution I have offered. It calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish information that is upon the files of his Department. I do not understand that the Secretary of the Treasury has information concerning the character and value of the vessels constructed at the Philadelphia navy-yard. I will not object to the amendment suggested by the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.]

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON THE MILITIA.

Mr. SMITH. I was just entering the Hall as the Committee on the Militia was called. I ask consent to submit the following resolution, which I have been instructed by the committee to submit to this House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be allowed a clerk, who shall receive the usual salary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like the gentleman to explain what particular necessity there is for this clerk.

Mr. SMITH. The Committee on the Militia, considering the amount of work already before them, and that which will probably be added hereafter, have deemed it necessary to ask for a clerk. The Secretary of War has recommended that the militia throughout the United States shall be reorganized; and upon that recommendation, and also after a consultation which I have had with General Grant upon that subject, we have concluded that there will be an amount of labor that no one or two members of the committee can be expected to do; and we have thought it but fair and right that the House should give us the assistance of a clerk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask, what would be the labor to be done by such a clerk?

Mr. STEVENS. I have not been able to hear the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] and to understand what necessity there is for a clerk, beyond the ordinary recording in a journal the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. SMITH. I will state again the necessity there is, in the opinion of the Committee on the Militia, for a clerk. I know that heretofore the Committee on the Militia has been looked upon by this House as a committee with but little to do. But in consequence of the past four years' war, the difficulty experienced in 1861 in getting out forces to defend the Government, and in ascertaining what was the real fighting strength of the country, the Secretary of War has recommended a complete and thorough reorganization of the militia throughout the United States, in order that there should be a uniform militia system among the several States. General Grant, the commander-in-chief of the Army, has recommended the same thing. In conversation with me the other day, he informed me that it was very important that should be done, and he has interested himself as far as he can to give us whatever information was possessed by him and other distinguished generals under his command.

There has also been referred to the committee a resolution instructing us to find out the number of a certain kind of arms in the country, for the purpose of making a fair distribution of them among the loyal States, not including those States in the South that now claim to be loyal. The committee propose to collect all the militia laws of the several States, in order that we may have the information necessary to prepare a system which will be general, and by means of which the President of the United States and the generals under him may know exactly what is the force subject to the call of the Government at any time, for any given length of time not exceeding six or twelve months, as the case may be.

Now, having these important subjects before us, and understanding, as we think we do, their great importance, we consider that no one committee can be expected to be willing to enter upon this investigation and correspondence without any assistance; and therefore I am instructed to ask for a clerk, that he may take a portion of this labor off our hands. I think it but fair and just, under the circumstances, that the House should give us this assistance.

Mr. BANKS. We have been trying for more than a quarter of a century to organize the militia of the country. It is one of the most important interests in this country. When the war of the rebellion broke out, almost every State was unprepared, because there had been no attention given to a proper organization of the militia. For the last twenty-five years nearly every bill or proposition of a law that has been proposed in Congress for a reorganization of the militia of the country has been defeated. Now, if the Committee on the Militia shall undertake the work of reorganizing that arm of the Government power as it ought to be reorganized, it will render one of the most important services to the country which can be rendered by that or any committee, and it will have one of the greatest labors imposed upon any committee of the House, and I think it ought to be allowed the services of a clerk if it undertakes that duty.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution; and there were—ayes seventy, noes not counted.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) for increasing the bond of the Superintendent of Public Printing; when the Speaker signed the same.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th of June, 1867; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for January 18, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN BECKER.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of John Becker for payment for damages by United States troops to private property in Wisconsin; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RANDOLPH BENNET.

Mr. DELANO, also, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the memorial of Randolph Bennet, contractor for furnishing rations to the troops raised by the provost marshal of the twelfth district of New York; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS A. GIBBONS AND F. X. KELLEY.

Mr. BARKER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution, with a report in writing, referring to the Court of Claims the papers of Francis A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelley, praying for reimbursement for money advanced and material furnished in the construction of light-houses in California and Oregon.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. HIGBY, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining be authorized to employ a clerk, and that he receive the compensation already fixed by the House for clerks of committees.

Mr. HIGBY demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] will consent to withdraw the call for the previous question. I desire to offer an amendment that each committee of the House, not now having a clerk, be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual pay.

Mr. HIGBY. I insist on the call of the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. Then I hope that the House will refuse to sustain the call.

Mr. HIGBY. Understanding that the gentleman from Maine proposes to submit an amendment in good faith, and not to break down the proposition which I have submitted, I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof these words:

That each committee not now having a clerk be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual compensation.

I make this proposition in good faith. It is exceedingly convenient to members of any committee to have a clerk. We all understand the duties of a clerk, and how useful a clerk is to a committee. It may be said, I know, that only important committees should have clerks. But I submit that the committees are all important. Of course, the rules would not provide for a committee unless there were important business for such a committee. If there be any committees that have not important business to prepare and present to this House, let those committees be abolished.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to give a clerk, not only to every committee, but to every member of a committee. That will be very much more convenient.

Mr. PIKE. I presume that the gentleman, as a member of a committee, has now a clerk at his convenience. Other gentlemen may not be so favorably situated. I speak now for the general convenience of the House. More than one half, I suppose, of the standing committees of the House now have clerks. I understand that in the Senate all the committees have clerks, irrespective of the amount of business.

It would be invidious for me, Mr. Speaker, to attempt to designate the committees of this House that could dispense with clerks, did they choose to do it. There are some committees that have so much business that it would be very inconvenient for them to be without clerks, while there are other committees, I presume, that might, with great personal sacrifice on the part of the members, but with such sacrifice as their patriotism would cheerfully make, dispense with a clerk. I move the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the whole subject be laid on the table.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 79, noes 18. So the whole subject was laid on the table.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, presented additional papers relative to the contested election in the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

UNITED STATES PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill concerning the pay department of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill and a joint resolution of the House, of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France; and

An act (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint assistant assessors of internal revenue.

GRANT OF LAND TO IOWA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UTAH.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to provide for the repeal of the law organizing the Territory of Utah, and for dividing said Territory, and attaching a portion thereof to the Territory of Nevada, and the residue thereof to the Territories lying contiguous to the Territory of Utah.

ADDITIONAL TAX ON COTTON.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to impose an additional tax upon cotton; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, making appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Chester, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SARAH WITT.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Sarah Witt; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. J. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to regulate the terms of the United States courts in the eastern district of New York, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House then resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; on which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I intend to submit to the House upon the consideration of this most important question, I shall endeavor to confine myself strictly to the subject under consideration; nor will I attempt, as has been done by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY], to throw any charge of disloyalty or insult into the face of those who disagree with me upon the great political questions which for four years have agitated the people of this country. From the foundation almost of the world, at least for thousands of years, men have disagreed upon political and religious subjects; and it appears to me that it shows a great want of courtesy upon the part of those who are opposed to the views of this side of the House on questions of policy which interest the country to charge them with being secessionists and rebel sympathizers.

I think that the history of the country for the last four years, and of the party to which I have belonged all my life, will show, notwithstanding the charges which have been made, that no purer and nobler patriotism has been exhibited by any class of people than by those who belong to the party opposed to the party now in power. And I am willing to accord to those who are advocating this extreme and radical change in the social status of the people of this country with being influenced by convictions of right and conscientious duty. I am not here to charge them with an attempt to interfere with the interests of the country knowingly; but I am here to say to the conservative men who have not followed in the radical footsteps of the leaders of the Republican party that it is time, now when peace has resumed its functions, that that party should stop and think before they make such a radical change in the political status of the people.

I hold that there never has been, in the legislation of the United States, a bill which involved so momentous consequences as that now under consideration, because nowhere in the history of this country, from the time that the first reins of party strife were drawn over the land, was any political party ever known to advocate the doctrine now advocated by a portion of the party on the other side of this House, except within the last year and during the heat and strife of battle in the land. The wisdom of ages, for more than five thousand years, and the most enlightened Governments that ever existed upon the face of the earth have handed down to us that grand principle that all Governments of a civilized character have been and were intended especially for the benefit of white men and white women, and not for those who belong to the negro, Indian, or mulatto race.

When the Declaration of Independence was made there were thirteen colonies which joined in the formation of it. In every one of those colonies were negroes, who were not entitled to exercise the political privileges allowed to the white people.

In every one of those colonies slavery existed when the Declaration of Independence was made, and in all but Massachusetts when the Constitution of the United States was framed. When the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] undertakes to plant himself upon the footstool of our fathers, he plants himself upon the doctrine, as enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States, as understood by our fathers at the formation of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States, that no persons in this country at that time were considered as citizens but the white race.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know whether I understand the gentleman; but does he affirm that the Supreme Court of the United States has ever said that nobody but white people were citizens when the Constitution of the United States was adopted?

Mr. ROGERS. I do say that at the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted nobody was included within the general term, people or citizens, except white people, and that they were the only sovereigns. I say that it has been solemnly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in one of the most celebrated cases that ever came under the cognizance of that court, that at the time the Constitution was framed nobody was included within the term people or citizen but white people, and that the Government was made solely and alone for white men and white women, and not for the colored race at all.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman will not deem me guilty of impropriety if I ask him to name the case in which such a decision was made.

Mr. ROGERS. I have the case. It is the Dred Scott decision, in which that very question was raised, and where, after mature deliberation, the Supreme Court of the United States, on the bench of which sat the greatest lights of American jurisprudence that have sat there either before or since, decided that black men were not included, nor was it intended by the framers of the Declaration of Independence, when they declared "all men equal and entitled to certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," to include in that declaration the African race that existed on this continent at that time, or who had been imported as slaves from the shores of Africa and placed among us.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will pardon me, but as he appealed to me by name, I desire to put another question; and that is, whether he ever heard of the distinction between the dictum of a judge and the decision of a court?

Mr. ROGERS. I have.

Mr. KELLEY. Will he, then, point out the facts which raised that question before the court, or the language in which it was decided? My recollection is that, falsifying all history, one of the judges of that court asserted what the gentleman now announces as the decision of the court. And I affirm that when the Constitution was adopted the free colored men of New Jersey, and of all the States adjoining it, and of all the States in the Union save South Carolina, with, as I said yesterday, the possible exception of Delaware and Virginia, in which suffrage was regulated by statutory and not constitutional provisions, were citizens, and did vote for delegates to the Convention that framed the Constitution, and also upon the question of its adoption. And I challenge any legal decision or any historical work to contradict the assertion I have made.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I do contradict the assertion of the honorable gentleman, and I will prove it by reference to the case. If the gentleman will look over the opinion of every judge that delivered an opinion in that case, he will find that not one of them dissented from that doctrine. And there is nowhere in any of those opinions any such ground taken as that taken by gentlemen here, that when those men framed the Declaration of Independence they meant to declare that they were going to enter into a war with Great Britain for the purpose of settling the rights of the African race as it existed in this country at that time. The object of the war of the Revolution was to proclaim liberty to the white people of the country. They were the people who assembled in the Hall of Independence and pronounced that great axiom of human liberty, when they declared that they would destroy the power of Great Britain over them, and that, because of the tyranny which that country attempted to exercise over them, they would be free. They are the ones who fought the battles of the Revolution, who followed in the footsteps of Washington and the other great generals who led the heroes and sages of the Revolution; they are the ones who have put down this rebellion—this mighty, gigantic rebellion—which for the last four and a half years has swept over this land, and they are those who perpetuated and handed down to posterity unimpaired this bright heritage of liberty to the white race, for which the blood of our fathers was spilled on the battle-fields of the Revolution.

I refer now to the decision to which the gentleman calls my attention, although it is earlier in my argument than I intended to allude to it. Here is the opinion of the court; it is found in 19 Howard, page 406:

"The question then arises, whether the provisions of the Constitution, in relation to the personal rights and privileges to which the citizens of a State should be entitled, embraced the negro African race at that time in this country, or who might afterward be imported, who had then or should afterward be made free in any State, and to put it in the power of a single State to make him a citizen of the United States, and endue him with the full rights of citizenship in every other State without their consent. Does the Constitution of the United States act upon him whenever he shall be made free under the laws of a State, and raised there to the rank of a citizen, and immediately clothe him with all the privileges of a citizen in every other State, and in its own courts?" * * * * *

"It is true, every person and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States became also citizens of this new political body, but none other; it was formed by them, and for them and their posterity, but for no one else. And the personal rights and privileges guaranteed to citizens of this new sovereignty were intended to embrace those only who were then members of the several State communities, or who should afterward, by birth-right or otherwise, become members, according to the provisions of the Constitution and the principles on which it was founded. It was the union of those who were at that time members of distinct and separate political communities into one political family, whose power, for certain specified purposes, was to extend over the whole territory of the United States. And it gave to each citizen rights and privileges outside of his State which he did not before possess, and placed him in every other State upon a perfect equality with its own citizens as to rights of person and rights of property: it made him a citizen of the United States."

"It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine who were citizens of the several States when the Constitution was adopted. And in order to do this, we must recur to the governments and institutions of the thirteen colonies when they separated from Great Britain, and formed new sovereignties and took their places in the family of independent nations. We must inquire who, at that time, were recognized as the people or citizens of a State whose rights and liberties had been outraged by the English Government, and who declared their independence and assumed the powers of government to defend their rights by force of arms."

"In the opinion of the court, the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument."

Mr. KELLEY. As the quotation which the gentleman has just read begins, "the question then arises," I propose simply to ask him whether that question arose in the case or in the necessity and progress of the elaborate discussion in which Judge Taney buried the vital question of the case.

Mr. ROGERS. It did arise in the case. It was the main question. It was to settle whether Dred Scott was a citizen, and whether he had been absolved from the chains of slavery which had been placed upon him by reason of the new location he had acquired. It was to settle the identical point, the very question, of the status of persons of color—whether, according to the Constitution of the United States, or even according to the terms of the Declaration of Independence, as understood by its spirit and intent, these persons were or had been intended to be included within the people or the sovereign power of any of the States or of the Federal Union.

Mr. KELLEY. In order to exhibit to the House and to the gentleman himself how thoroughly he misapprehends the decision he is discussing, I ask him if he will have the kindness to state what the court decided in that case. That will settle the whole question.

Mr. ROGERS. The court decided—and I doubt not every intelligent man has read the decision—that Dred Scott was not a citizen of the United States, nor of the State; that he was not included within the terms citizen or people either by the letter or spirit of the Constitution of the United States; that he was not one who could participate in the sovereign power of the State; that he had no political status in the State or United States; and that, therefore, he, by no act of his own in locating himself in any place, could become a free citizen and be entitled to prosecute in the courts of the United States or of any State.

Mr. KELLEY. With the gentleman's leave, as he will not announce what the court decided, I will. It decided that it had no jurisdiction over the case before it and turned it out of court, thus proclaiming, by its own solemn decision, that the long tirade of misrepresentation of historical facts which the gentleman has just read was outside of the case, and had no judicial value. That was what it decided.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand the theory of the gentleman with regard to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I understand the sanctity that has been given to those decisions by the radical portion of the party to which he belongs; that when the Supreme Court condescends to bow its knee to radicalism and decide cases in their favor, it is law, but when they proclaim to the country, in pursuance of their oath of office and the high dignity of their station, what is the law according to the Constitution of the United States, they are then branded as usurpers, secessionists, and tyrants, and their decision is entitled to no consideration. I am here to defend the laws of the country, to defend this decision, although it may militate against the opinions of the radical portion of those opposed to me in politics, as the decision of the highest tribunal of the United States of America, and as one that sustains that great principle of American jurisprudence that the people of the country must stand by and obey the decision of the Supreme Court until that decision is overcome by some authority of equal power and importance.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment, and I will promise to interrupt the gentleman no further upon this point. The gentleman is slightly mistaken. The Republican party of the country stands by that decision till it shall be reversed. I have never heard a member of it deny that the court decided that it had no jurisdiction in the case. The assault upon the decision comes from those members of the other party who urge that though it had no jurisdiction it did decide the infamous dogmas which they accept as their creed.

Mr. ROGERS. The case decided that the person, Dred Scott, was not within the jurisdiction and powers of the court, for the reason given, and which lay at the very foundation of the question of jurisdiction, that he was not a citizen of the United States, and was in no condition, according to the laws of this country, to put himself in the place of an actor in a court of justice. I stand here to-day to affirm, without fear of contradiction, that that decision is the supreme law; and I defy any man to point to the opinion of any single judge, in that case, (as I have frequently had my attention drawn to this point,) who dissented from the opinion of the court, as I have read it, upon the status of the colored race at the formation of the Constitution of the United States.

And now, while upon this subject, I proceed further to review the radical notions which the gentleman has attempted to get adopted by this House, with regard to what the framers of the Declaration of Independence meant when they made that immortal instrument. Those framers appealed to the civilized world, and enunciated the reasons which they assigned for making the assertion that all men were born equal, with certain inalienable rights, among which were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Now, if the theory of the gentleman be true, that the negro race, the Africans in this country who were then in slavery, were included in the word "people," then the Declaration of Independence was a falsehood and a fraud; and it appealed to the people of the civilized world upon a false ground when it asked for their sympathy and consideration, when at that very time thousands of negroes were held in slavery and had no liberty. I am not willing to believe that the sages and heroes of the Revolution, the men who were covered with its glories, who assembled in the old Hall of Independence and formed the Constitution of the United States, were so base as to proclaim that all men were entitled to certain inalienable rights, among which was liberty, while at that very time the whole thirteen of the colonies held almost every African man and woman in the bonds of slavery.

Now let us see what the Supreme Court says about this Declaration of Independence:

"The language of the Declaration of Independence is equally conclusive."

"It begins by declaring that 'when in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.'"

"It then proceeds to say: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of those governed.'"

"The general words above quoted would seem to embrace the whole human family, and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood. But it is too clear for dispute that the African race were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this Declaration; for if the language, as understood in that day, would embrace them, the conduct of the distinguished men who framed the Declaration of Independence would have been utterly and flagrantly inconsistent with the principles they asserted; and instead of the sympathy of mankind, to which they so confidently appealed, they would have deserved and received universal rebuke and reprobation."

"Yet the men who framed this Declaration were great men—high in literary acquirements, high in their sense of honor, and incapable of asserting principles inconsistent with those on which they were acting. They perfectly understood the meaning of the language they used and how it would be understood by others; and they knew that it would not in any part of the civilized world be supposed to embrace the negro race, which by common consent had been excluded from civilized Governments and the family of nations, and doomed to slavery. They spoke and acted according to the then established doctrines and principles, and in the ordinary language of the day, and no one misunderstood them. The unhappy black race were separated from the white by indelible marks and laws long before established, and were never thought of or spoken of except as property and when the claims of the owner or the profit of the trader were supposed to need protection."

This decision refutes the whole idea which has been advocated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] when he says that he stands upon the ground of Madison and Jefferson. I want to refer him to James Madison, as one of the fathers of the Democratic party. He was the man who wrote the memorable resolutions of Virginia of 1798. He is the man who proclaimed to the world at that time that the acts of the John Adams administration were violative of the rights of the States and tended to imperial despotism and centralization of power; who announced to the world that the centralization and consolidation of power in the Federal Government were sapping the liberties of the people; and at the very next election contested, upon the principles of those resolutions, the Adams or Federal party was removed from power and the great Democratic party was inaugurated by the election of Thomas Jefferson, which party carried on the Government in domestic peace and happiness for twenty-four years without interruption.

I do not want such men as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to defile the graves of the men who stood by their country in the hour of its peril, who planted the first flag of freedom on this continent. It is a slander upon the proud record of Madison to charge him with advocating the doctrines of radicalism, as enunciated by the honorable gentleman upon this floor, when the record and history of that man and this country, as known to every honorable gentleman here, show that there is no foundation for such an assertion. Why, sir, we have been charged with being secessionists and sympathizers with treason for advocating these very resolutions which James Madison drafted, advocated, and carried through the Legislature of Virginia. Although James Madison was President of the United States for eight years, never did he attempt to promulgate or indoctrinate into the country or his party any such creed or dogma as has been advocated here by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. If Madison, whose memory is now enshrined upon the highest pinnacle of fame, in speaking of the mass of citizens in the letter which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has read, intended to include the colored race, he was false to his principles for advocating the doctrine that this was a white man's Government solely, when he was placed in the presidential chair by a very large majority of the States and people. The honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] says the Constitution seems to invite the passage of this bill and a general law giving negroes all political rights demanded by the radicals in power.

I think it will not be seriously denied by any of the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House (for whom I have as much respect as for gentlemen upon this side, only disagreeing with them in politics) that the men who founded our Government and proclaimed their independence of Great Britain, or when they framed the Constitution, never intended, by any word or letter, to countenance the idea that the Constitution should be at some time changed, or a law passed so as to allow to the race then held in bondage, of whom the present race are the descendants, the exercise of the highest political function that can be given to any man upon earth. I cannot sympathize with the spirit of sarcasm and disparagement in which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCORFIELD] spoke of the "mere dropping of a slip of paper in a box," ridiculing the high prerogative which the political system of this country has given to the masses, rich and poor, to exercise the right of suffrage and declare, according to the honest convictions of their hearts, who shall be the officers to rule over them. There is no privilege so high; there is no right so grand. It lies at the very foundation of this Government; and when you introduce into the social system of this country the right of the African race to compete at the ballot-box with the intelligent white citizens of this country you are disturbing and embittering the whole social system; you rend the bonds of a common political faith; you break up commercial intercourse and the free interchanges of trade, and you degrade the people of this country before the eyes of the envious monarchs of Europe, and fill our history with a record of degradation and shame.

Why, then, should we attempt at this time to inflict the system of negro suffrage upon those who happen to be so unfortunate as to reside in the District of Columbia. This city bears the name of George Washington, the father of our country; and as it was founded by him, so I wish to hand it down to those who shall come after us, preserving that principle which declares that the sovereignty is in the white people of the country, for whose benefit this Government was established. I am not ready to believe that those men who have laid down their lives in the battles of the late revolution, who came from their homes like the torrents that sweep over their native hills and mountains, those men who gathered round the sacred precincts of the tomb of Washington to uphold and perpetuate our proud heritage of liberty, intended to inflict upon the people of this District, or of this land, the monstrous doctrine of political equality of the negro race with the white at the ballot-box.

No such dogma as this was ever announced by the Republican party in their platforms. When that party met at Chicago, in 1860, they took pains to enunciate the great principle of self-government which underlies the institutions of this country—that each State has the right to control its own domestic policy according to its own judgment exclusively. I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House to allow the people of the District of Columbia to exercise the same great right of self-government; to determine by their votes at the ballot-box whether they desire to inaugurate a system of political equality with the colored people of the District.

Self-government was the great principle which impelled our fathers to protest against the powers of King George. That was the principle which led the brave army of George Washington across the ice of the river Delaware. It was the principle which struck a successful blow against despotism and planted liberty upon this continent. It was the principle that our fathers claimed the Parliament of England had no right to invade, and drove the colonies into rebellion, because laws were passed without their consent by a Parliament in which they were unrepresented.

I am here to-day to plead for the white people of this District, upon the same grounds taken by our fathers to the English Parliament, in favor of self-government and the right of the people of the District to be heard upon this all-important question. Although we may have a legal, yet we have no moral, right, according to the immutable principles of justice, and according to the declaration of Holy Writ, that we should do unto others as we would they should do unto us, to inflict upon the people of this District this fiendish doctrine of political equality with a race that God Almighty never intended should stand upon an equal footing with the white man and woman in social or civil life.

Mr. DRIGGS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to eulogize James Madison upon the ground that he opposed centralization of power as advocated by John Adams. I should like to ask the gentleman how he stands now with regard to reconstruction. Is he in favor of centralization of power in the President, or of extending the power to Congress?

Mr. ROGERS. I am opposed to centralization of power in the hands of Congress or in the hands of the President. I believe that this is not a national Government, but that it is a Federal Government. I know that it has not a oneness or singleness of power like the Austrian and Russian Governments; and any man who will look at the history of the country and the Constitution of the land must know that all power not delegated to the General Government is, under our political system, reserved to the several States. Power in our Federal system is plural, and is as many as there are States. In our State systems it is also plural, and is as many as there are people. The whole people are the sovereign power of a State. The States are the sovereign power of the Federal Government, and by them only is the Federal Government carried on. Without them an officer of the Government cannot be elected. A majority of the people of a State can elect officers, as, for instance, a Governor, but a majority of the whole people may not be able to elect a President. If the rights of the States are taken away this then becomes a national and not a Federal Government. It may then consolidate power and become an imperial despotism. It may then exercise power equal to that of the Czar of Russia or the Emperor of France.

It is easy to prove that this is a Government of the States and not of the people. A majority of the people of the United States cannot even elect a President of the United States. Why? Because our fathers in the formation of the Constitution, wanted to throw all the safeguards possible around the States, and to preserve the powers they had not delegated to the Federal Government. The rights not granted to the Federal Government are reserved to the States or the people. In order to elect a President of the United States, he must have a majority of the electoral votes of the States. A majority of the people may be in favor of a man for the Presidency, and yet he may be defeated upon the great principle of State sovereignty. It is the foundation-stone of the whole fabric of our Government. It all rests upon the inalienable rights of the several States. The party who insist here that the States are not supreme in the exercise of undelimited powers, and assert that all of the powers of the States are subservient to congressional legislation, ought to call down upon its head the indignation of every lover of his country.

Look, too, at the election of a President by the House of Representatives. If you look at the Constitution, you will find that when the election is referred to the House of Representatives each State is entitled to only one vote. If there be thirty-six States, and nineteen contain only one quarter of the voting population of the Union, their votes in the House of Representatives will elect the President, although the seventeen States against him contain three fourths of the voting population. And upon the same principle of State sovereignty is a Vice President elected when the election is in the Senate. This was made a Government of States because the founders of the Government saw that it was necessary to prevent the repetition of the same tyrannical power which England exercised toward the colonies. It was to preserve and to perpetuate liberty and the great doctrine of self-government. It is a Federal and not a national Government, because no amendment can be made to the Constitution except by the States, and though four fifths of the people in mass in the whole Union should vote to amend it, yet it provides no amendment can be made unless three quarters of the States, through the exercise of sovereign power and as States, adopt it. There is no officer whose election depends upon more than one State that can in any way be elected but by the sovereign States. In our intercourse with foreign countries we act in the capacity of a nation for commerce and common defense; but in our domestic character, in our intercourse with each other, we are many nations. The Federal Government is supreme and sovereign in the powers delegated to it by the States; and the States are supreme and sovereign in their reserved or undelimited powers. The words majority and minority do not apply to the whole people in mass, but only to the States. To prove that this is a Government of States I need only refer to the census up to the fifth census.

When the Federal Government was organized in 1789, there were eleven States, having fifty-nine Representatives, of which four States had thirty-two, while the other seven had but twenty-seven; and yet this minority of the people could elect a President and control all the powers of the Federal Government.

By the first census in 1790 four States had a population of 1,710,000. The other seven had a population of 1,390,000. The minority had eighteen in the Senate over the majority.

By the second census in 1800 the whole population was 4,247,000, of which four States had 2,228,000. The other twelve States had 2,021,000. The four States had a majority of the whole people, but had only eight votes in the Senate and eighty-two for President, while the minority had twenty-four votes in the Senate and ninety-one for the President.

At the third census in 1800 there were seventeen States, with a population of 5,765,000, of which four States had 2,948,000. The other thirteen had only 2,717,000. Still the majority had but eight votes in the Senate and one hundred and one for President, while the minority had twenty-six votes in the Senate and one hundred and fourteen for President.

By the census in 1820 six States had a population of 4,199,000. The other eighteen had 3,657,000. While six States had a majority of 542,000 of the people, yet they had only twelve votes in the Senate and one hundred and twenty-six for President, while the minority had thirty-six votes in the Senate and one hundred and thirty-five for President.

By the fifth census six States had a population of 5,535,000, while the other eighteen had but 5,311,000. The majority still had but twelve votes in the Senate and one hundred and thirty-six for President, while the minority had thirty-six Senators and one hundred and fifty-three votes for President.

Each man had a right to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness, and no construction can be given to the Constitution rationally and consistent with justice, that if a State gives up certain of its powers to an agent, it thereby gives the agent sovereign power in matters not delegated.

Mr. MOULTON. I understand the gentleman to say that this is a Federal rather than a national Government, and he undertakes to illustrate his position by reference to the election of President. I would like to ask him, supposing we change the Constitution so that the President shall be elected directly by the people, what sort of a Government would that be—Federal or national?

Mr. ROGERS. It would be purely a national government with regard to elections of a President and leave the Federal system remaining in the other matters, so that the Government would be both national and Federal, mostly national. It would not be really a Federal Government, because it would not have all the attributes of a confederacy. There would not be power on the part of the State to control the election of Federal officers against a majority of the people. A majority of the people in other words could control the States in such an election. I hold that a State under the Federal system has the right to exercise its powers as a State. And no other State has a right to enter the eminent domain and jurisdiction of that State and take away one single undelegated power.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If, in the adoption of the constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery throughout the United States, all the States had agreed to it but Kentucky, and she refused to abide by the amendment, would she, therefore, be entitled to hold slaves?

Mr. ROGERS. I have not the least doubt that, according to the intent of this system, according to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, there is no power in the Federal Government, or in all the States but one, that can take away one single undelegated power without the consent of that State. In other words, a State is entitled to a Governor, to a Legislature, and to hold courts, as undelegated or reserved rights; and thirty-five States have no right, by an amendment to the Constitution, to take away that right which exists in that State individually. Admit that power, and you make the Federal Government supreme and unlimited, with the consent of three quarters of the States, even though it may rob the States of all their sovereign power. I am perfectly clear upon that point—that the States have some rights of their own; that in regard to everything relating to their eminent domain they have sovereign jurisdiction, and the Federal Government is sovereign and supreme in regard to everything delegated to it by the States, namely, upon every express and necessarily implied power in that Constitution for the purpose of carrying into effect the spirit and intent of the Constitution. And whenever the Federal Government, through an amendment to the Constitution, as it is termed, attempts to destroy that great principle of the sovereignty of a State, and deprive it of its reserved powers, it is usurpation and tyranny, and ought to be met by all the force of the State government that it can command.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he remembers a citation which Mr. Cox quoted at the last session from Mr. Calhoun, wherein the latter affirms that in the adoption of the Federal Constitution the States have parted with their sovereignty to three fourths of the States in which the highest principle of sovereignty known to this Constitution existed.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand the doctrine of John C. Calhoun to have been partly as the gentleman states and partly not. It is this: that the States gave up to three quarters of their number everything that was within the spirit, letter, and intent of the constitutional power given to the Federal Government, and that upon no other power could an amendment be made; and that when a so-called amendment was attempted to be made to the Constitution, which was a supplement and not an amendment, it was an organic act which required the consent of every State in the Union.

Mr. DEMING. The great principle of safety against all these amendments which have been supposed—for instance, an amendment introducing a monarchical system in this country—depends on the voice of the majority required to carry it out. In the first place we must have two thirds of the two Houses, and we must have three quarters of the States. We must have the people who elect the Representatives to this House, as they elect representatives to the State Legislatures, to ratify and affirm the instrument. And the whole system is disorganized when you propose an amendment of that character—that is, a monarchical amendment—and the people have gone over body and soul to monarchy.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman hold that an amendment can be made to the Constitution of the United States by three fourths of the States and two thirds of both Houses of Congress that will take away the Legislature, Governor, and courts, and all the sovereign powers of any one State?

Mr. DEMING. I hold to the absolute power of making amendments to the Constitution except in the cases restricted, and our safety is the people; because when the people get so thoroughly disorganized as to ratify and adopt any such amendment as that introducing a monarchical system we are all gone.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman then hold that amendments can be carried on to an unlimited extent, except in one thing—with regard to representation in the United States Senate—and that that exception proves the rule; and because that exception is there, in all other matters amendments may be made?

Mr. DEMING. I hold to the absolute power of the two bodies and of the States to make amendments to the Constitution, and I reiterate that our safety against these amendments supposed is in the people.

Mr. ROGERS. This brings me to another suggestion that more strongly fortifies the argument I have made, and which suggestion was not at any time made in the discussion of the question about amendments of the Constitution last winter. If I understand the gentleman, he takes the ground that because the Constitution of the United States provides that it shall not be amended in one particular—with regard to representation in the Senate—that exception proves the rule; that because that exception to the power of amendment is there, it shows that the framers of the Constitution when they formed it, and the States when they adopted it, intended that it could be amended by three fourths of the States so as to destroy and take away every power reserved to the States and which they had not delegated to their Federal agent. Now, if that is the true construction of the Constitution of the United States, then the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the State of Maryland, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in South Carolina, and the decision of the highest court of the United States in the State of New York, that Government bonds cannot be taxed because they are used by the Federal Government as a means to carry its purposes into effect, are false and erroneous.

The only limitation which the Constitution places upon the power of taxation by a State is that no duties shall be laid upon exports or imports by a State except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its own inspection laws; yet it was decided in the Bank case in Maryland, Charleston case, and in the great case tried in New York by the court of appeals without a dissenting voice, that although the Constitution of the United States makes no exception to the power of any State to tax anything of any character save in regard to duties on exports and imports, yet the exception did not prove the rule, and the State had no right to tax the Federal bonds. Why, for the simple reason that Federal bonds are one of the instrumentalities employed by the Federal Government to carry its powers into operation. There is nothing in the letter of the Constitution of the United States that infringes in the least upon the right of the several States of this Union to tax every single Government bond which has been issued here even upon a contract on the part of the Government with the bondholder that the Government will not tax the bonds, (which contract I deny;) yet it cannot be done, for the simple reason that this is an act within the sovereign power of the Federal Government, is an act within the sovereign power of Congress under the Constitution, is a weapon used by the Federal Government to defend itself and carry its own powers into execution. To tax these bonds by a State would be against the spirit and intent of the Constitution, because it would clog the wheels of the Government if the States had the right to tax the Government bonds, the United States mails, the custom-houses, patent rights, and all these things. Why? Because they are means employed by the Federal Government to carry its own powers into effect. Therefore the exception in the Constitution of the United States, that it shall not be amended in relation to United States Senators, does not prove that within the spirit and intent of the Constitution, which is its corner-stone and foundation, which is its blood and life, any amendment can be made unless it happens to come within the very terms of that exception.

Gentlemen talk of this as a national Government, and that seems to be the theory of most gentlemen upon the other side of the House. I am satisfied that there are honorable gentlemen upon that side of the House who have the true theory of the Government in their hearts, who know that their children are to come after them, and that they are to legislate for posterity, who can see as well as I that the Government is now on trial, that there is a contest between liberty and consolidated despotism, and that they desire to leave liberty to their children undefiled and unblotted as it was given to us by the blood of our fathers through the severe trials of the Revolution, that it may be handed down to their descendants unimpaired forever and ever. I have no more concern in the stability of this Government than any other man upon this floor, and when I speak for the great rights of the States here, that which I utter I utter in no partisan character, but with an honest love for my country, not only North but South. I love the whole people and the whole land. I consider that I stand here as well the representative of the interests of South Carolina as the representative of the interests of New Jersey. I have not forgotten the old doctrine of Daniel Webster, that there is no East, no West, no North, no South, and I warn the people of the eastern States that the day may come when those small States may want to assert their dignity in the Union by that balance of power which the Federal system contemplated when it allowed the smallest States to have as much representation in the Senate as the greatest State in the whole Union. Why, if our fathers did not intend to preserve the rights of the States, did they give to New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Vermont, each the same power that could be exercised by the great State of Virginia or the great State of New York? They did it because our fathers wanted to prevent that very imperial despotism which they had fought to put down; they wished to implant in this country a system of liberty that would protect minorities as well as majorities. And if the States have no rights, if their rights can be destroyed by amendments to the Constitution, then I say liberty in this country has fallen from the luminous sphere of freedom, and never will light here again until we come back to the principles of our fathers, and exercise them in the spirit of Christianity—I mean those principles of justice to all parts of the Union which were inscribed upon the banners which our fathers followed when they put down the legions of King George and proclaimed liberty throughout the land.

In answer to that question of the gentleman, I will say that when the treaty was made between Great Britain and the United States, every single one of the States was named by name. The States under the old Articles of Confederation were sovereign and independent; and when our fathers framed the Constitution of the United States, they intended to give up but such as they delegated to the Federal head, which were amply sufficient for the inherent power of every government to protect its own existence from all foes whether within or without.

The memorable revolution in England, of 1688, was denominated by Voltaire as the era of English liberty. James II had rendered himself so obnoxious to the English people that he was obliged to flee for his life. The people then overthrew the dogma that the Legislature was above the people, and that the people had no right to govern themselves. Since the revolution of 1688 England has had forty-one revolutions, all of them growing out of this same despotic idea that the Government is above the interests of the people and the system upon which the Government was founded. It was to resist the usurpation on the part of the Government of Great Britain, that deprived the people of liberties which they held as inherent rights under the laws of God and of man, that there resulted the stupendous revolution that gave to the people of Great Britain the Magna Charta.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman's time be extended so as to allow him to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. ROGERS. Another evidence that this is a Federal Government, or a Government of States, is that each State is entitled to two United States Senators, and as to that the Constitution prohibits an amendment.

I will now proceed more in the true line of the subject before us. There was no negro who planted himself upon this continent who was not brought here from the coasts of Africa as a slave. Every single negro man and woman in this land are the descendants of African slaves; and at the time negroes were brought here from Africa there was not a free negro upon this continent, and none were ever free except by the sovereign consent of the State, or manumission by the masters. For more than one hundred years before the Declaration of Independence was made negroes had been regarded as beings of an inferior order; they were bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise. That idea of their condition was fixed and universal in all the civilized communities, without an exception, in the civilized world.

The English Government seized them upon the coast of Africa and brought them here and sold them. The Constitution recognizes them as slaves, and contains a provision expressly permitting negroes to be imported into this country and sold as slaves up to the year 1808.

Therefore I say to this House and to the country, that the change which is attempted to be made in our social system is one never thought of or dreamed of by those who controlled the organization of this Republic, or by those who have controlled it down to within the last two or three years.

To show how consistent New England has been in this negro-equality subject, I will quote some of the legislation of those States upon the subject of the status of the negro, to show that where radicalism now seems to be running more mad than in any other part of the country they, by their legislation, regarded these Africans as an inferior race so far as to prohibit cohabitation and marriage of the two races.

The revised code of Massachusetts, published in 1836, forbids the marriage of any white person with a negro, Indian, or mulatto, under penalty of six months' imprisonment in the common jail, or to hard labor and a fine of not over two hundred nor under fifty dollars; and it also declares the marriage to be absolutely null and void. I do not know whether that law has been repealed or not. Some of the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts can answer that question. But it shows that our fathers always kept in view that one great idea which God has planted in the human heart, that there is a distinction between negroes and whites that no law can change.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the system of African slavery is not a system of comparatively modern introduction and history in the world, a system which has had its origin and existence for two or three centuries only. I would like to ask him also whether the great fabrics of Grecian and Roman slavery which characterized those States throughout all their history were not systems of slavery founded upon the enslavement of the white race; and if he answers those questions affirmatively, then I would beg him to state whether it would not be as logical to reason in favor of the national justice of white slavery, from the universal practice of Greece and Rome for centuries, and of all civilized States which were their contemporaries, as to reason in favor of the national justice and fitness of African slavery from the practice and history of modern civilization.

Mr. ROGERS. I am glad that the gentleman has interrupted me, because, probably, without his interruption I might have been placed in a false position with regard to the true object of the argument which I am attempting to present.

I am not here to advocate the right to enslave any man. I am here to protest, as much as the gentleman himself, against holding white men or black men in slavery. But I desire to show the status and standing of the African race, as not having been considered fit to enter into the political community with the white people of the country. I do not seek to idolize or sustain the system of slavery as it has existed in this country or any other, because I think that the enlightened intelligence of the present age would not warrant me or any other man in standing here to argue, in the face of the consequences which have lately overtaken this class of beings, that they ought to be held in slavery. I am willing to admit that slavery existed, as the gentleman asserts, in Greece and Rome; and affirm that in those countries the highest intelligence of the age and the noblest patriotism were exhibited by those who at the same time held white men in slavery. But that was a dark and barbarous age compared to the enlightened wisdom of modern times; but as men advanced in enlightenment and civilization, the holding of white persons in bondage became obnoxious to the educated reason of humanity.

But I say that the moral right to hold slaves was not denounced by the Saviour of the world when He came to proclaim peace and good-will to all men. The records of biblical and profane history refute the idea that slavery is necessarily immoral, since it did not call forth the indignation or rebuke of the Saviour of the world when He was pursuing His sublime ministry among a people who held millions of white men in bondage. I say that in still earlier days the oracles of God were committed to slaveholding prophets and patriarchs. The highest form of civilization and the noblest development of manhood that can be found in olden times is found among the ancient slaveholding commonwealths of Greece and Rome. Among the wreck and ruins of their genius we find the germs of many of the most vital principles of our civilization; but the white slaves were made so by war, and not on account of the inferiority of the races.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me for one moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has quoted from the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts of 1836, and has inquired, as I understand, whether the law remains the same in that State at the present time. I desire to answer the gentleman on that point.

The gentleman will recollect that it has been the misfortune (as he doubtless considers it) of Massachusetts to have very few Democratic Governors; but during the administration of the first Governor of that description that Massachusetts ever had the law to which the gentleman has referred was repealed, that Democratic Governor approving the act; and I believe that that repeal was effected under the lead of a distinguished gentleman, then a Democrat, since a Democratic Governor of Massachusetts, and more recently a Representative on this floor.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I understand the gentleman to say that the Saviour of the world sanctioned slavery.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not say that. I say that He said nothing in disapprobation of it. That is what I said. I mean of holding white men as slaves, which appears to me much worse than holding black men in slavery. In fact He taught that the servant should obey his master.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Well, I understand the gentleman to say that he himself does disapprove of it—that he is opposed to it. Therefore, I suppose, he takes issue with the Saviour.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir, I do not take issue with the Saviour. I would not be so fool-hardy or irreverent as to take issue with the omnipotent Ruler of the universe. I leave that to the gentleman. But I say that, although white slavery existed in the commonwealths of Greece and Rome, yet when a more enlightened period came, the people saw the injustice of the system, as those slaves were captives taken in war, and that system was by other and future generations given up. But until a comparatively recent period of the world's history the law of nations did not prevent the kidnapping of slaves from the coast of Africa and the selling of them to any who would purchase them.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will allow me one moment. He has alluded to the question which I asked him, but he has not, perhaps, answered it as fully as the House might have expected. He has, however, just dropped a statement which is perfectly true, that in the history of Roman and Greek civilization there came a time when the slaves were made free.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that.

Mr. THAYER. It is, at any rate, a fact which, I suppose, the gentleman will not deny.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that, and will not be so reported. I said that when a more enlightened period came the people saw the injustice of the institution. I did not refer to those people particularly; I spoke of the people generally. The system of holding white persons in slavery was given up. But until a comparatively recent period slaves were kidnapped from the coast of Africa, and the laws of nations did not forbid their being sold to any who would buy them.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I do not think that Greece or Rome ever engaged in the African slave trade.

Mr. ROGERS. I never said that they did. I admit that they did not.

Mr. THAYER. I have never heard that they did; but the gentleman has stated that there arrived a time when Greece and Rome gave freedom to millions of slaves that had groined in bondage underneath their power. Now I will ask the gentleman whether, when freedom was given to those slaves, they did not also confer upon the freedmen the rights of Roman citizenship. I should like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. ROGERS. They did to a certain portion of them, such as they saw fit, upon the ground that those persons were not taken because of their being an inferior race. It was then according to the laws of war that the conqueror held the captives of war as slaves, and it was to correct that barbarous code of war that Greece and Rome granted slaves citizenship, together with freedom, upon no other ground. They had never a system of slavery like that of African slavery; they had no such system of slavery as that which has been in existence for the last three hundred years; the slaves they freed were captives of war, held as slaves under the laws of war. It was then held to be the law that the captives of war and their posterity were the slaves of the captors, and their property of every kind was confiscated to the uses of the captors. They were slaves forever by the laws of war.

Mr. THAYER. And their posterity.

Mr. ROGERS. The condition of things there grew out of the laws of war. It was in pursuance of a war power such as that which was unconstitutionally used by the radicals in power to strip the people of the South of millions of dollars invested in slaves whom they inherited from their fathers, and to whom they were lawfully entitled, some of whom were undoubtedly the descendants of Madison, whom the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania attempted to eulogize, as Madison was a slave owner, as well as Washington and the other heroes of the Revolution. The Greece and Roman war power was the same kind of power claimed by the Republican party during the last four years in laying the mailed hand of military usurpation and tyranny upon the rights of the people, and trampling upon a bleeding and degraded Constitution. That was the power under which slaves were held in ancient Greece and Rome. But afterward a new power was exercised; it was not the power of war, but it was the power of theft and of robbery; the power of taking poor, harmless, inoffensive savages from the coast of Africa, stealing them, and carrying them here, and selling them into bondage to the people of the colonies. And England, after profiting and getting rich out of them, then raised the cry that slavery was an evil, and sent Thompson and other men here to destroy the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the people of this country.

Now, sir, New Hampshire regards these people as of an inferior race. The laws of New Hampshire passed in 1815, and also in 1855, only ten years ago, prohibited any one from being enrolled in the militia except free white male citizens. Ah! the gallant State of New Hampshire, the State which sent its thousands to put down the rebellion, had a law upon her statute-book as late as 1855, making such a discrimination between the white man and the black man as would not allow a negro to march side by side to the banks of the Mississippi with the white man.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not know the history of legislation in New Hampshire; but I do know that a law of Congress from the very beginning of the Government had defined that the militia of the country should consist of the white male citizens alone.

Mr. ROGERS. It is immaterial what the laws of Congress were; I am talking about the laws of New Hampshire. I am talking of the laws of that extremely loyal and patriotic State of New Hampshire, and the laws of extremely patriotic and loyal New England. The State of New Hampshire, in 1855, by solemn enactment affirmed the legislation of 1815, that no man should be enrolled in the militia but free white citizens. Now, I do not suppose that the members from New Hampshire will vote that the downtrodden people of this District shall be degraded by being put upon a political equality with the negroes whom the State of New Hampshire would not allow even to fight for the country or make a part of her militia. With what grace can they vote for this bill?

This bill goes further than ever was pretended by any State where legislation has been had on the subject. If that bill passes, it allows the negroes not only to have the right to vote, but to become judges of the courts, mayors of the city, and to hold the highest offices within the gift of the qualified voters of the District. That is its effect, and it will not be contradicted by any one on the other side. As it has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, it not only allows these negroes to vote, but to hold any office to which they may be elected. Such a course would disgrace and degrade us before the nations of the earth. Shall this fair temple, which has been reared by the genius and wisdom of our fathers, be despoiled, and the city built in the name of Washington be so far insulted that a black man shall be mayor of the city or sit as judge in the capital of the United States; that a negro shall preside over the rights and liberties of white men and women in this District? I conceive that the Providence that has watched over this country from its infancy, and guarded the cradle in which it was reared, will not allow such degradation here as will result in amalgamation and miscegenation, and end in insurrection and murder and a war of races. I have read in history of fires kindled in the name of religion, of atrocities committed under the pretext of order and liberty, but I believe, if negro suffrage is adopted all over this land, it will lead to scenes in this country more bloody than the world has yet seen. I believe the horrors of St. Domingo and Jamaica will be repeated. Because I do not believe that the white men who are rearing their sons and daughters in the ways of virtue, honor, and liberty, will be willing to lay their heads in their graves with such a legacy as negro suffrage to leave to them.

I want to refer to another New England State, and that is Rhode Island, because these States are considered authority by many. I know their citizens are patriotic and noble. I give them due credit. New England is the spot where abolitionism held greater sway than anywhere else; and yet from the State of Rhode Island or any other State no petition ever came to Congress asking for the abolition of slavery that urged or suggested the scheme of equality of the black man with the white at the ballot-box. No such petition was made at any time by the most ardent advocates of the abolition of slavery.

Therefore, gentlemen, I ask you in the spirit of candor and honesty, in the spirit of the days of our fathers, in behalf of the soldiers who fought to free the negroes, those soldiers whose deeds and memory constitute the glory of the present and the proudest inheritance of future generations, do not disgrace those soldiers who have laid down their lives and those who have come back to protect their little homes, by allowing those living to be overrun and overpowered at the ballot-box by eight or nine hundred thousand Africans for whose freedom from slavery the blood of many of the soldiers was spilled. I think I have too much patriotism, too much consideration for the brave soldier that left his wife and little ones to fight for his country, to say that he suffered and bled for the purpose of perpetuating the political rights of a race that he helped to relieve from bondage.

Now, Rhode Island, in 1822, and also in 1844, in its revised code, forbade any white person to marry any Indian, negro, or mulatto, under penalty of $200, and declared the marriage null and void. Why did Rhode Island do that? I ask the honorable gentlemen from that State, why did Rhode Island declare such a marriage null and void, and inflict heavy penalties upon those who entered into the contract? Why? Because the people of Rhode Island knew that there was an impassable gulf which God Almighty himself had established between the white man in his condition and the black man in his. It was because the wisdom of ages, as handed down to us from days of the most remote antiquity, had impressed upon their minds that there was that inequality which had shown itself by experience existing between the two races which could not be obliterated by any human law which could be established upon earth, as the law of God had ordained it. I stand by that law.

But gentlemen upon the other side of the House say that there is no impediment in the Constitution of the United States to the passage of this bill. I am not here to deny the authority, the legal authority, of this Congress to inflict this punishment upon the people of this District if they see fit; but I am here to ask them to allow the people of the District to say whether they will have negro suffrage or not. I ask them to heed the language which was uttered by James Madison, and which was read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to stand by the warning voice of Madison, and allow those who are to be governed by the law to say by their votes whether they want this Legislature to pass this law. James Madison says, in one of the papers read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

"Under every view of the subject it seems indispensable that the mass of the citizens should not be without a voice in making the laws which they are to obey, and in choosing the magistrates who are to administer them."

Who are citizens? Who were citizens when James Madison wrote that letter? The white people. Does not this decision of the Supreme Court which I have read show that the persons spoken of by James Madison as citizens, and whom he wanted to vote, were the white men who made up the parts, the integral minutia, of the sovereign power of the States? Why did he write this letter? Because when the Constitution of the United States was framed and the constitutions of the different States were made, there was not a State in this whole Union which allowed all white persons to vote. The States of this Union, when their constitutions were originally made, put exclusive restrictions upon the privilege of voting. Every State, without one single exception, required that a man in order to vote or hold office should have a property qualification. That was the objection in the mind of James Madison. That was what he intended to condemn, and it was to that that his language referred.

Why, sir, by the constitution of my own State until 1844, a man could not vote unless he had £50 in proclamation money. He could not go to the lower house of the Legislature unless he had £250 in proclamation money. He could not go to the Senate of the State unless he had £500 in proclamation money. It went upon the principle that if a man had a jackass worth £50 on one day he could vote, but if he sold the jackass next day the jackass could vote, but the man could not vote at all. [A laugh.] That was what James Madison was complaining of; and remember that while so complaining he was adhering to and recommending the great doctrine of self-government; that the people who were to be controlled by the laws should have the right to say whether the laws should be passed or not.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House claim that the people are the sovereign power. It was so claimed by them in the memorable fight on the Kansas bill that, because the constitution framed at Lecompton was not submitted to the people of the Territory of Kansas, the State should not be admitted under that constitution. Men of all parties, including many of the great shining lights of the dominant party, with the lamented Stephen A. Douglas at their head, all declared against allowing the Lecompton constitution to be the organic law of the people of Kansas, unless that constitution was first submitted, not to a Legislature, not to a convention, but to the people of Kansas, to decide what kind of a constitution they would have, so that Congress might know that the power emanated from the people, through the people; and when they did allow that Territory to come into the Union, it was upon the ground of a sovereign exercise of power on the part of the people.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman has referred to the laws of New Hampshire of 1815 and 1855, which authorize the enrollment only of white citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. I will say, sir, that in so doing they only followed the law of Congress of 1792, and that they did so because they had no right to pass a law which would authorize the enrollment of colored citizens.

I would say further that Massachusetts, by her Legislature, attempted to reform her constitution in that respect, and I believe that their act was vetoed by the Governor of the State simply because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say that I understand these laws to be made in favor of the colored race, giving them advantages over white people. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON. I will simply state that the law of 1792 was not repealed until after the war commenced; I think in 1861.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman does not deny that what I have stated in regard to the legislation of New Hampshire is true; that in 1855, by a State law, negroes were not allowed to be enrolled in the militia of the State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly not; and I have stated the reason.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand that the gentleman undertakes to excuse the action of the State of New Hampshire on the ground that the Federal Congress had forbidden the enrollment of negroes. I suppose the gentleman will not deny that the first calls that were made by the President of the United States, in fact all the calls that were made by the President up to the passage of the enrollment bill, or bill of despotism, as I call it, were made upon the Governors of the States, and the Governors took out of the militia such persons as they pleased. Under those calls negroes were put into the service by Massachusetts before that enrollment bill was passed; they were received without objection, and some of the quotas of States were in part filled by those very negroes before the enrollment bill was ever passed at all. The law of Congress is no excuse for the action of the State of New Hampshire. I mention the action of that State simply to show what its intention was. If they had simply wanted to live up to the law of Congress, they would not have said anything about excluding negroes from the enrollment, because if the law of Congress controlled the enrollment of the militia in the State of New Hampshire, it was unnecessary to fortify that law by any law of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman from New Jersey says we are imposing upon the District of Columbia that which no State in the Union has imposed upon herself. Allow me to state, in behalf of Vermont, that black men vote there with white men.

Mr. ROGERS. With a property qualification.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. There is no property qualification. There the black man can hold civil offices with white men. There he has been free; and let me tell the gentleman, that in consonance with the principles which have been adopted in the State of Vermont, and as the direct effect of those principles, when we enlisted eighty negroes living in the State of Vermont to go into a company, there was not one of them that could not sign his name to the muster roll. That is my comment on the course that Vermont has taken in relation to the negro.

Mr. ROGERS. How many negroes have you in the State of Vermont?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I really cannot state at present.

Mr. ROGERS. A very inconsiderable number; such a number as can in no way affect the political status of the people of the State of Vermont. But I have no doubt that if the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] would throw aside his partisan character and feelings, and the negroes in Vermont were sufficiently numerous to overbalance the whites, if allowed political privileges, he never would submit the rights of his wife and children and property to the control of negro ballots and negro officers.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I wish merely to say to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] that I have not now the means at hand to enable me to state how many negroes there are in the State of Vermont. I know of a great many there, but I do not know one who ever voted with the party to which the gentleman from New Jersey belongs. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. That may be. I am not particular how they vote. I am not making this argument from any consideration of political power. We have already been told by members upon the other side of the House that to allow the negroes to vote will be to overbalance the power of the white people of the southern States, and keep the control of the Federal Government in the hands of the now dominant party. I rise above party. I rise above the petty schemes of cliques and parties to a more commanding position. I rise to the position of my country, which I believe is to endure for generations to come; and I want that country handed down to those generations that they may enjoy life, liberty, and property, as I and my ancestors have enjoyed them. I do not intend my remarks for party considerations. I do not speak for party. I am here to advocate this great doctrine for no party; I am here to advocate it for the interest of the whole country, believing that all are interested, and that the day will not be far distant when the wisdom of the Democratic party will be acknowledged as a bright and blazing star upon the escutcheon of American glory, which will yet lead the world to the safe and secure resting-place of liberty.

Mr. GRINNELL. I believe it was on my motion that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] had liberty to proceed with his remarks indefinitely.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, I have been very liberal.

Many MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. GRINNELL. When I made that motion I had no idea the gentleman had so great a gift of continuance. I wish simply to ask if it would not be in perfect consonance with his wishes to print the remainder of his remarks.

Many MEMBERS. "No!" "No!"

Mr. ROGERS. I would prefer to say what I have to say.

Mr. GRINNELL. Well, I will only say that I made the motion under great misapprehension. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. The Speaker and every member of this House know that I have been necessarily drawn out to this great length of argument by the questions and interruptions of those who do not agree with me in the sentiments I have uttered.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understood the gentleman to say that New Hampshire had a complete control over this matter of militia in that State. Does not the Constitution give to the General Government the right to organize the militia?

Mr. ROGERS. Not for State purposes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Article eight of section one of the Constitution gives Congress the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia." That is the language of the Constitution. And in accordance with that provision of the Constitution the act of 1792 was passed, which says that only white persons shall be enrolled in the militia. And the law of 1815, of New Hampshire, was based upon that action of the Congress of the United States. New Hampshire had no right to pass any law in conflict with that law of the United States. It was in conformity with the laws of the General Government that New Hampshire acted in this matter.

Mr. ROGERS. It is expressly provided in the Constitution that the President may call out the militia to suppress insurrection and repel invasion. And it was under that clause of the Constitution that the President of the United States made the several calls which he did make before the enrollment bill was passed. And every call that was made by the President up to that time was made upon the Governors of the several States. And although the Constitution of the United States confers the power upon the Federal Government of organizing and controlling the militia, it does not give it the power of saying who shall constitute that militia, or whom the State may release from the obligation of the militia laws of the State, and leaves the State the power of appointing the officers; and for State defense Congress certainly could not prevent the State from classing negroes in its militia.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey, if the call of the President of the United States could in any way change the law of New Hampshire, or the law of Congress in this matter, or could authorize the State of New Hampshire to pass a law in conflict with any law of the United States?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman knows very well that it was held by a large portion of the people of this country that the President had no right by law to take into his hands twenty million people, regardless of the rights and domestic tranquillity of the States, so as to control the whole militia and deprive the State in case of invasion of using its own militia to protect its own rights. It was also held, and I believe that was the letter and spirit of the Constitution, that the act of despotism which placed in the power of the President of the United States the lives and liberties of twenty million freemen was in violation of the Constitution and nothing more nor less than usurpation. The framers of the Constitution intended that the militia of a State should be under the control of the sovereign power and jurisdiction of the State, to be furnished by the State when called for in such numbers and with such qualifications as the State should please to prescribe. When the State in its sovereign capacity furnished the men to the Federal Government then the Federal Government had the right to organize and arm the men the State had furnished. The Administration had the right to fix the quota, and it did so. It called upon New Jersey to furnish so many thousand men, and other States their various apportionments. But it is still a fact that, under that call, the States by their legislation exempted from militia duty firemen, Quakers, and other classes of citizens; and the President never claimed the right under that call to interfere with the various exemptions which were made by the laws of the different States.

Now, sir, I maintain that the negroes have no just claim upon the people of this country to stand in an equal position politically with the white citizen. I say nothing in disparagement of the abilities of the negro as exhibited on the field of battle or elsewhere. I am the friend of the negro in his proper position. I always treat him with respect and consideration. I believe, however, that the result of his freedom, taken in connection with the state of society into which he has been thrown, will necessarily result in his consignment to the same sad fate by which the North American Indian is fast being swept from the face of our land.

I say that the negroes are not entitled to the exercise of equal political privileges with the white man. What have they done for the country to entitle them to this great political prerogative which they have never heretofore claimed, and which, until recently, no one has pretended that they had a right to exercise? Who raised the armies to put down this rebellion? Who were the men that carried our flag in triumph from Virginia to Louisiana? Whose efforts kept the proud banner of the Union waving unceasingly over the Capitol of the Union? Who were they that came in teeming thousands from the hills and the valleys of every State in our land to find an unmarked grave on the battle-fields of the South? Who were the officers that led these mighty armies in their work of putting down a gigantic rebellion? Who were they that, in this Congress, in the various Legislatures, and amid the assemblies of the people, carried on the political machinery of our Government during this terrific contest? Was all this the work of the negro race or of the white race? The poor white soldiers who came forward, periling, and in many cases sacrificing, their lives to defend their homes and those of their more aristocratic neighbors, are the men who are entitled to the credit of the final victory of the Union armies. Had it not been for the negroes the labors, perils, and sacrifices of the white soldiers would not have exacted such tremendous losses in their glorious ranks, and the heroic dead would not have been sacrificed upon the altars of shrieking fanatics. History will record the white soldiers as foremost among the illustrious throng, resting in the immortality of their national fame, won by their heroic qualities and eminent services, whose daring bravery opened the way to crowning victory, and around whom will cluster the peculiar warmth, gratitude, and affections of the white men and women of this land. Their deeds have proven them to be warriors of the highest order, and their life in war has shown them to be the very type and model of Christian heroes. From the first battles in Virginia to the final blow in the war, their dauntless valor was exhibited in every field. They have, in the opinion of people who love the white as much or more than the black race, reaped a rich harvest of fame, become an example to their countrymen and the admiration of the civilized world, and the memory of their deeds and the spirit they inspired glows through the hearts of their countrymen to-day in raptures of love for their valor, patriotism, and self devotion. The names of such martyrs to republican liberty and independence canonize them to the faith and devotion of the lovers of their country, and constitute a resistless appeal to the justice of God and the sympathies of mankind to save them from negro suffrage in this land.

Ah, sir, this negro question has already cost the lives of a million of brave soldiers. It has placed on the shoulders of ourselves and those who shall come after us a debt of $3,000,000,000. It has carried desolation and anguish to thousands of homes in every State of this Union. It has orphaned a countless myriad of wan and woe-stricken children, in whose homes destitution has taken its abode, and whose wail of distress rises this day to heaven. The fathers and relatives of such as these are the men by whose aid the rebellion has been suppressed. Shall the brave soldiers of our Army be now, by any kind of extreme and radical legislation, put upon an equality with the very men whom they fought to free?

Why, sir, the negroes have gained more by this rebellion than any other class of people in this country. They have gained the blessed heritage of freedom; freedom to breathe the air of heaven and walk the earth with no one to molest them or make them afraid. What a great and glorious work, our opponents claim, has been achieved by the white people of this country; a work by which four million down-trodden slaves have received the blessing of freedom. Ought not the negroes to be contented with what they have gained by this war? Why should we seek to introduce into our political system, for their benefit, a principle to which our fathers gave no sanction in the establishment of the Government, and which must tend to degrade the high character of American citizenship in the eyes of the enlightened world?

This question has its weight upon both sides. Where is the foreigner, the Irishman, the Frenchman, the German, the Scotchman—I ask them why they left their native land? Why did they leave the pleasant banks of the Rhine and the Rhone? Why did they leave the vine-clad hills of France and Germany? They left them because they were told that there was a social equality among the white men of this country; that a man, however poor, who had to carry the hod or to dig the ditch, was entitled to come in at the time of an election and cast his ballot equally with the richest and noblest in the land. I say that those foreigners had better have remained in their native land; that their ships had better have been stranded upon the coasts of Ireland and Scotland, England or France, than to have come here to have themselves degraded and to be placed in a social position where equally with themselves negroes shall be allowed to exercise the great right of suffrage at the ballot-box.

Why, if you have to have these men vote because they have fought in the Army, then I want all the women who went down into the Army to administer to the suffering soldiers to be equally entitled to vote. I want all from the age of ten and upward, all who were in the Army, from the youngest drummer boy up to the age of twenty-one, to vote, without regard to whether they are twenty-one or not. Nobody, however, seems to be legislating for them. No one takes into consideration the great benefits that those under the age of twenty-one have bestowed upon the country. They are entirely left in the dark. But this mighty, influential, African negro, who by the laws of God has been imprinted with a black color, seems to receive not only the only, but all the consideration of the House. His name is mentioned in almost every subject which interests us.

It is not pretended that suffrage is a natural right, except by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who says that they have the right by the laws of God. He says that the arguments against it have neither Christianity nor humanity about them. He says that they have the right to exercise this right by nature. He says that the black man has by nature the same rights as the white man. He says that the negro has the same right that we had under the Constitution to put down rebellion—the right of self-defense. He says that he has the right to exercise that right of self-defense—that he is as much entitled to it as any white man, however high he may be.

I suppose gentlemen have not forgotten that the negroes were not so loyal. How few of the four million slaves took advantage of the emancipation proclamation of Abraham Lincoln! The records of the war show that while a few of them came into the ranks of the Federal Army, the great body of them remained true and loyal to the South.

We are told by the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that this is a bad governed city, and that its inhabitants have sympathy with the rebellion. It is perfectly immaterial whether the people are loyal or disloyal. I would no sooner go for such a law in South Carolina than in New Jersey or this District. I am for leaving that to the people of each State and this District to act for themselves. Now, sir, in every State where the negro-suffrage question has been submitted to the people, it has been repudiated by large majorities, and the Representatives of those people come here, and insist on forcing negro suffrage on the people of this District. I am for exercising toward the people of the South the greatest charity, and am for admitting them at once to full representation. I am for the Union in fact. But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] takes issue with the President in his enunciation of the doctrine that each State has sovereign power and control over the question of suffrage, and he claims that the Constitution of the United States confers the power upon Congress to regulate the qualifications for suffrage in each State, and quotes to prove his position the following clause of the Constitution:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

That clause has no relation to the qualifications of the voters, but only to the times, manner, and places of holding elections; and the question of qualifications was settled in the Constitution by the second section of the first article, which declares that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The people of this District have already repudiated negro suffrage by over six thousand in this city, with only thirty-five in favor, and in Georgetown there was but one vote in its favor, Democrats, soldiers, and Republicans all voting against it in both cities.

Mr. DAVIS rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to any further interruption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to yield for a personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey what number of black soldiers were enrolled in the armies of the Republic.

Mr. ROGERS. I have not the statistics to answer the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS. There were over two hundred and forty-one thousand of them.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object to this, because it leads to difficulty among friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know how many negroes were enlisted in our armies, but I know that they were nothing like the proportion of white men.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to state that their population in this country in 1860 was something over four millions, and that the percentage of black troops which entered the armies of the Republic was almost as great as the percentage in the free States of white people who entered those armies.

I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his sarcasm, which I intend to answer when I have an opportunity upon this floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Or outside of these walls. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. I know that the State of Kentucky furnished no negroes at all. The States of Delaware and Maryland may have furnished a few. The State of New Jersey furnished none. The great body of our armies which put down this rebellion was composed of white men.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's second hour has now expired.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that he be allowed to go on for the rest of the session. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. It is not fair to object when I have been so frequently interrupted.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his objection.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been appealed to by my friends about me to withdraw my objection. I would do so for but one thing. I have been visited with the maledictions of some of my friends for the last hour, saying that I deserve to be reprimanded for what I have already done. Now, if I yield and allow the gentleman to go on further, I shall be subject to a second reprimand.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman's first hour expired, and a motion was made that he proceed indefinitely, and the House consented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. It has been repeatedly decided that an indefinite extension of the time lasts only one hour. It is indefinite up to that time; but of course the gentleman from New Jersey could not expect to speak to-day and all to-morrow under an indefinite extension. Sometimes the extension is fifteen minutes, and sometimes ten. Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw the objection?

Mr. GRINNELL. I do not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to suspend the rules in order to allow the gentleman to go on.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection, the gentleman has made so good a speech.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I renew it.

Mr. ROGERS. To prevent any further trouble, I will stop here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BANKS. I desire the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to allow me to state a fact relating to the legislation of some of the New England States upon the admission or exclusion of colored soldiers from the militia, to which the gentleman from New Jersey has referred. I understand that the legislation in the New England States on this subject has proceeded upon the belief that they had not the constitutional power to exclude colored soldiers; that all of the States have acted upon that view. In the State of Massachusetts, some years ago, the question arose whether the Legislature, by a change in the constitution or laws of that State, could include colored soldiers. The supreme court of Massachusetts gave a unanimous opinion that the State had not the power to change the laws of the United States, on the subject of the militia, so as to include colored soldiers in the State militia. And when the Legislature passed a statute, embracing or admitting the colored soldiers in the militia, the Governor vetoed the act, although they had covered every law upon the statute-book of that State.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House to-day to trouble the House with any remarks at the present time. I do not now propose to reply to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS]—to the very logical, argumentative, clear, and able speech he has made. I shall not attempt to make his contradictions harmonize, nor to answer in detail the points which he made.

The gentleman champions the white soldiers of the United States. He says we ought not to inflict upon them the injustice and disgrace of giving to the colored men of the country the elective franchise. I believe it is the first time I ever heard that gentleman champion the soldiers of the Army of the United States. If I recollect right, during the last two years at all events, that gentleman has been one of the foremost of his party in doing all in his power to embarrass the operations of the Army of the United States and the soldiers of the Republic. He has done what he could to prevent the Government of the United States from sending reinforcements and additional arms to relieve and assist our armies in the field. And with the bulk of his party, among other things which I now recollect, he voted against the passage of the bill in this House providing for a speedy trial of those guerrillas among the rebels who were shooting our poor soldiers in the back as they were dragging themselves away from the battle-field wounded, marking their footsteps with their blood.

And if I am not mistaken, the gentleman, with the rest of his party in the State of New Jersey, refused to give to the white soldier who had left his native State and gone into the field, periling his life in defense of his country, the right to vote even as to who should represent that State in the Congress of the United States. Perhaps that is the reason why we have had so many of that persuasion in this House.

Now the gentleman invokes the white soldier, and protests against this injustice which would be done him. Sir, it is not the white soldier who objects to clothing the black man with the elective franchise. It is not the white man who has fought shoulder to shoulder with the black man upon the ensanguined field who objects to these people. Not he. The objection comes from the gentleman from New Jersey, and such as he, who have opposed the war and the soldiers, white and black.

One of the gentleman's contradictions I may perhaps point out here. After citing the decrees and laws of Greece and Rome, and of the old Mosaic dispensation, and, for aught I know, the laws of the Choctaws, Seminoles, Pottawatomies, and Cherokees, to prove that the proper condition of the negro was a state of slavery, that he was happier and more contented and better in every respect in such a condition, the gentleman finally sums up his speech by telling this House that we have already conferred upon the blacks more benefits than we have upon all the rest of mankind, namely, liberty—that greatest, supremest, best of all blessings which can be conferred upon man, freedom!

Well, is it so? Is it true that freedom is a boon and a blessing to black men? Why, then, did not the gentleman and his party sooner vote to confer that blessing upon them? Why did they steadily and persistently oppose the amendment of the Constitution which would confer the blessings of freedom on these people? Then they argued that it was no blessing, that it was a curse rather—it was an injury. Turning the black man away from the roof of his master without the kind protection and guidance of his owner was no boon, as these gentlemen argued then, but rather a curse. Well, sir, if freedom is a blessing and a boon, if freedom is the highest right that a man possesses, then is the right to protect that freedom a high and divine and holy right.

It has been said that the right to vote is not a natural right. I confess that I cannot see why it is not. It is truly said that the right of self-defense is the first law of nature. The right to vote, the ballot, is the freeman's defense; and if his right to freedom is an inalienable and natural right, then, too, is the right to protect that freedom an inalienable and natural right.

The gentleman from New Jersey says that at the time of the organization of this Government and the adoption of the Federal Constitution black men were not regarded as citizens; that this is a white man's Government and that the fathers who established it had no intention of making a Government for black men. I take issue with the gentleman there. I say that our fathers made this Government for men; not for black men or white men, not for Anglo-Saxons, not for Irishmen, or Germans, or Americans merely, but they made it for men. I take issue with him, too, in his assertion that blacks were not regarded at that time as citizens, and had no part nor lot in the Declaration of Independence. Upon this subject of the Declaration of Independence and the understanding and design of the fathers who framed it, I want to call the attention of the House to what Thomas Jefferson said on this subject. It will be recollected, I have no doubt, by most of the members of the House, if not by all, that shortly after the revolutionary war Mr. Jefferson used this language:

"Let it ever be the boast of America that the rights for which she has contended are the rights of human nature."

What did he mean by "the rights of human nature?" I suppose the gentleman from New Jersey would say he meant white human nature, the nature of men with fair skins and blue eyes. But we are not left in the dark as to the meaning of Mr. Jefferson in using this phrase. I find in Jefferson's works, volume one, page 135, this language used by him in reference to slavery:

"But previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa. Yet our repeated attempts to effect this by prohibition and by imposing duties which might amount to prohibition have been hitherto defeated by his majesty's negative, thus preferring the immediate advantage of a few British corsairs to the lasting interests of the American States and to the rights of human nature."

Again, in speaking of the action of the Legislature of the State of Virginia on the subject of slavery, he used similar language. He says:

"In the very first session held under republican government the Assembly passed a law of perpetual prohibition of the importation of slaves. This will in some measure stop the increase of this great political and moral evil, while the minds of our citizens may be ripening for the complete emancipation of human nature."

Then Mr. Jefferson meant by "human nature" the nature of man, whether with a black skin or a white skin, whether a slave or a free man. The boast of this country, he said, should be that the rights for which she fought were the rights of man, no matter what his color or clime or condition.

Why, sir, it was not until a few years ago that our Government refused to issue passports to colored American citizens traveling abroad describing them as citizens of the United States. I well recollect to have seen an original passport issued to the servant of John Randolph when traveling abroad, describing him as a "citizen of the United States." It was not until we had taken our departure from the doctrines of the fathers, long and long after the Constitution was made, that the infamous doctrine crept in that the black man had no "human nature," had "no rights which white men were bound to respect," and that none but white men could be citizens of the United States. It is an infamous, a mean, a narrow, a devilish doctrine.

Mr. Speaker, there are some things said by gentlemen upon the other side of the House which deserve only to be answered by ridicule, for they are ridiculous. Among them is this everlasting cry of negro equality and amalgamation. The gentleman from New Jersey spoke of it, and denounced this bill now under consideration as an attempt to place the negro upon a social equality with the whites.

He says this is a white man's Government. "A white man's Government!" Why, sir, did not the Congress of the United States pass a law for enrolling into the service of the United States the black man as well as the white man? Did not we tax the black man as well as the white man? Does he not contribute his money as well as his blood for the protection and defense of the Government? Oh, yes; and now, when the black man comes hobbling home upon his crutches and his wooden limbs, maimed for life, bleeding, crushed, wounded, is he to be told by the people who called him into the service of the Government, "This is a white man's Government; you have nothing to do with it?" Shame! I say, eternal shame! upon such a doctrine, and upon the men who advocate it!

But "negro equality" is the bugbear which frightens gentlemen. The gentleman from New Jersey says that if we give the blacks of this District the right to vote, the first thing we will know will be that a black man will be elected mayor. Well, sir, if it be true, as the other side of the House contend, that it is necessary to have discriminating laws to oppress the black man in order to prevent his rising to an equality with the white, then it is rather a confession of his superiority than of his inferiority. If you are afraid he will rise, should he have a fair chance, to an equality with the white man, and beat him in the competition for office under as free a Government as ours, and therefore you must oppress him still more by discriminating legislation in order to prevent that, then he is superior to the white man and not his inferior.

I am inclined to think it is true that if we confer upon the black man the right to vote and the right to hold office, we will be more likely to have other men sent to Congress than some who have held seats here. And even if it were true that they would send one of their own race here, I would still vote for it. For on the whole, however my reputation for good taste might be called in question by some, I would prefer to sit by the side of Fred. Douglass in this Hall rather than by the side of Fernando Wood, for instance. [Laughter.] I believe it is not out of order to call names in this case, and if there is any offense I will answer for it to Fred. Douglass.

"Negro equality" is the everlasting skeleton which frightens some people. There is a class of men, and they mostly vote the Democratic ticket, who are afraid, if we confer upon the negro equal rights and privileges with themselves, there will no longer be left any race or class of men in the United States who will be their inferiors, and I think they are right about that. It is very natural for men to look down upon some one; almost every man prefers himself to others, and thinks at least that he is superior to some other man in many respects. That is a natural element in a man's nature, that of self-love. Men are very fond of considering themselves a little elevated above somebody else, and if we confer upon the black race the right to vote and hold office equally with these men there will be nobody left for them to look down upon and say "You are beneath me."

And the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] refers to another bugbear with which to scare ignorant people, that of amalgamation. He recites the statutes of various States against the intermarriage of blacks and whites. Well, sir, while I regard that as altogether a matter of taste, and neither myself nor my friends require any restraining laws to prevent us from committing any error in that direction, still, if my friend from New Jersey and his friends are fearful that they will be betrayed into forming any connection of that sort, I will very cheerfully join with him in voting the restraining influence of a penal statute. I will vote to punish it by confinement in the State prison, or, if he pleases, by hanging—anything rather than they should be betrayed into or induced to form any such unnatural relations. As for my own side of the House, we have no fears of that kind. Amalgamation is an outgrowth of slavery. It is where slavery has existed that you find it, not where the negro is free and has the right of self-protection.

Prejudice against the black man depends very much upon the status of the black man. It is a singular phase of character in reference to this subject of prejudice, that the prejudice is tenfold stronger against the free black man than it is against the slave. If the black man is only a slave, and in what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] denominates his proper condition, then he has no prejudice against him. You will find no prejudice in the minds of the people South against riding in the same coach or car with the black man, if only he is a slave and traveling with his master. But knock the shackles off his limbs, clothe him well, and give him the rights of a freeman, and at once these people will turn up their noses and say, "Humph! niggers in the cars; I won't ride with niggers." I recollect, some years ago, before we had horse railroads, I used to see, in this very city, a white lady riding in an omnibus, with a poor ragged slave girl carrying her child, sitting by her side. The poor slave girl was ragged and dirty, but she was a slave. The other day I saw that same woman get up in high dudgeon and flaunt out of a street car because a respectable, tidy, well-dressed, free colored woman came into the car to ride.

Prejudice, after all, is not so much against color as condition. People have no objection to riding in a carriage with a black man, if he sits forward and drives the horses. In that case he is considered as in his proper position, and there is no prejudice against associating with him; he has no bad smell. But the moment he takes a back seat, the olfactories of some people are greatly offended. This prejudice, too, has all grown out of slavery. There is no natural prejudice against color. Little children have none of it until they are told frightful stories of "horrid black men" by their nurses, to frighten them. Oppress and degrade any class of people for a long series of years, by unjust and unequal laws, and you will array against them the same prejudice.

What should be the test as to the right to exercise the elective franchise? I contend that the only question to be asked should be, "Is he a man?" The test should be that of manhood, not that of color or race or class. Is he endowed with conscience and reason? Is he an immortal being? If these questions are answered in the affirmative, then he has all those essential attributes of manhood that are possessed by the gentleman from New Jersey, or any other man; and he has the same right to protection that we all enjoy.

I am in favor, Mr. Speaker, of making suffrage equal and universal. I believe that the greatest wisdom is concentrated in the decisions of the ballot-box when all citizens of a certain age vote than when only a part vote. If you apply a test founded on education or intelligence, where will you stop? One man will say that the voter should be able to read the Constitution and to write his name; another, that he should be acquainted with the history of the United States; another will demand a still higher degree of education and intelligence; until you will establish an aristocracy of wisdom, which is one of the worst kinds of aristocracy. Sir, the men who formed this Government, who believed in the rights of human nature, and designed the Government to protect them, believed, I think, as I do, that when suffrage is made universal you concentrate in the ballot-box a larger amount of wisdom than when you exclude a portion of the citizens from the right of suffrage. While it is true that we have had in this country, at some times, in some localities, and at some elections, a class of men who are very dangerous on account of their ignorance and their passions, yet, on the whole, I think it is safer for our institutions and safer for ourselves to allow all men to vote than to establish any arbitrary tests which would exclude a part from the ballot-box.

I have never heard from the other side of the House any objection to the exercise of the right of suffrage by white men on account of their ignorance. When Congress passed a law by which the foreigner, ignorant as he might be of our language and our institutions, should be admitted to the rights of citizenship as a reward for one year's service in the Army of the United States, that measure had my hearty approval; and I believe that it received the approval of gentlemen on the other side of the House. The ignorance of that class was not at that time urged as an objection to conferring the franchise upon them. Now, sir, if a foreigner, totally ignorant of our institutions and language, is qualified, after a year's service in the Army, to exercise the right of suffrage, I ask, in God's name, whether the negro, a native of this country, who has been fighting for four years, is not equally qualified to exercise that right?

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will hear it with pleasure.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman has stated that he is in favor of universal suffrage. I desire to ask him whether the sympathy for the negro among the people of his own State has been sufficient to induce them to repeal that law, passed by their Legislature some time ago, which prohibited negroes from even becoming inhabitants of the State, much less enjoying the rights and franchises of a citizen?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am very glad that the gentleman has called my attention to that subject. The Legislature of Illinois has repealed all laws making distinctions on account of color except that with reference to the right to vote, which is regulated by a provision in the constitution of 1848; and, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I will rid our State constitution of the disgrace of that provision, and all other unequal and unjust provisions, as quickly as I can. I voted against the adoption of that provision; and I will vote in favor of its repeal whenever I can get the opportunity. If this is to throw me into a minority, then welcome a minority. I commenced in a minority. I began when it was necessary for the men who dared to speak upon the slavery question to stand shoulder to shoulder and maintain their position with whatever muscular power, as well as mental, they possessed. Thank God, I have lived to see the day when the principles I then advocated have become almost universal; and I expect to see the day when these ideas shall not only be universal, but when everything necessary to protect, maintain, and support them shall also be adopted by the American people.

I do not believe with those croakers who are eternally asking us of the North and of one another, "Why do you not do this thing in your own State?" Who point to Wisconsin and say that the elective franchise for the negro was voted down there.

The gentleman asks why it was not granted in Illinois. I believe if the men who have voted with me, belonging to the same political organization with myself and who acknowledge these principles to be right, could but steadfastly maintain this principle at home, which commands itself to their consciences, these disgraceful distinctions would be blotted out immediately in all the States. It has not been done because of the croakers who stand by and say that "it is not time yet;" that it is "premature;" that the "people are not up to the standard;" who say, "I am for it myself, but you must get the people to vote for it." It is because of the do-nothings and do-littles and these croakers that you do not carry this principle into effect in the northern States. Of course I make no personal allusion to any gentleman.

I expect as quick as we can get at it in Illinois we will rid that State constitution of that injustice as we have rid it of those disgraceful laws which the Democratic party had imposed upon it. The fact that these distinctions do exist in the northern States shall not deter me, and I hope will not deter any gentleman here, from doing his duty. We ought to do that which commends itself to our judgments and consciences, without reference to what A, B, or C may say. Let us rather root out these prejudices than cultivate them.

Sir, the test of suffrage is manhood, as I have before remarked. Is he a man? It is not a question whether the vertical rays of a tropical sun have stamped his face with the hue of darkness, or whether the slanting rays of a more congenial climate have pale his complexion to the standard of Anglo-Saxon beauty. It is not a question whether a man has white hair or black hair. Our fathers, when they framed the Declaration of Independence, declared that all men were created equal; but they did not mean to declare that they were all equally rich, all equally strong, all equally endowed with the same quantity of brain, all equally handsome, equally of color, of equal weight, of equal stature. They did not mean by that that every man should inherit the same amount of wealth; but they did mean, so far as these natural rights were concerned, that one man was equal to any other man. They declared, and made the declaration one of the principles of the Government which they established, that all men inherited the same rights. They declared that all men had the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And they said something more than that. They said that Governments were instituted to protect these rights. They said that the just powers of government were derived from the consent of the governed. If that be true, if Governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, will some gentleman, in God's name, tell me why this body of men who are under the Government have not the same right as I have to participate in it? What business have I to elbow another man off, and to say to him that he has no right here? Has God made me better than He has made him? We might as well partition off the atmosphere, collect the rays of the sun, and withhold them from the men we may conceive to be inferior to ourselves.

Another objection is made to the bill: it is said that the people of the District of Columbia voted against it, and are all against it, &c.

Sir, when we submit this question to the whole people of the District of Columbia, black and white, and take their vote upon it, I will be bound by it. It is the veriest mockery to talk about the people of the District opposing this. What! submit the question to a part of the people as to whether another part of the people shall vote? The very proposition is absurd. Submit the question to those who have prejudged against it, as to whether another man shall exercise the same right! I grant you that in the expression which was taken here it was all one way—against the black man, of course—but I will guaranty another thing, and that is, that among all those votes polled against these poor colored men, every rebel, secessionist, semi-secessionist, or copperhead in the District of Columbia, who was entitled to a vote, cast that vote against the black man. All the men who lived in the District in the spring of 1861, and who even paraded their secession flag, such as lived to get back from rebellion, voted on that day against the negro; and if you had submitted the question at that same poll as to whether Jeff. Davis was a better man than Andrew Johnson or Abraham Lincoln, you would have got nearly as large a majority in favor of the affirmative.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would ask the gentleman upon what authority he charges that the votes cast against negro suffrage were cast by any of those who were in the rebel army.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Universal repute.

Mr. MARSHALL. Ah! it is very easy to get up universal repute against anything. I am informed that there was not a single soldier in the Union Army that voted in favor of suffrage; that none such can be found in the city.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I doubt if many who had been in the Union Army voted; while I doubt, too, if there is a member on this floor who does not know some men in the District of Columbia, who have sympathized with the rebels since the war commenced, who voted against negro suffrage.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like my colleague to name them. These general charges are very easily made. They are entirely void of foundation and of truth.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We all know that Washington city has been full of sympathizers with the rebels.

Mr. MARSHALL. In making such general charges it is just as easy to say one thing as another.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, I say it; I declare that I have met them at every turn in this District during the war—men who sympathized with the rebels; men a little shade stronger in their sympathy than my colleague.

Mr. MARSHALL. These general charges are very easy to make. If the gentleman intends to charge or insinuate that I have either directly or indirectly sympathized with the rebels, he charges what is not true and has no foundation in fact.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We all know what that means.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, I know what it means.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We all know what it means; and I do charge that the men—and my colleague among the rest—who assembled in the city of Chicago and made the McClellan platform of 1864, did sympathize with the rebels.

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman has already had my response to that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Whether they intended to do it or not I do not know; but the effect of their action was to afford the rebels aid and comfort. The men who declared that the war was a failure, that the experiment of subduing the rebellion by force of arms could not succeed, and who called for the withdrawal of our troops and an amnesty, the patching up of a peace with the rebels, I do say by their conduct gave aid and comfort to the rebellion, and they did sympathize, so far as we may judge by their acts; for it is a well-known maxim of law that every man is to be deemed to intend the result of his own action.

I cannot of course tell what is in the heart of my colleague, or any other man, only as I can judge from his acts. I cannot say what emotions are there. I cannot read his thoughts, except as I read them through his acts. But if he says deliberately, on paper, and advocates it on the stamp, that this war should cease—that the attempt to suppress the rebellion by force of arms has proved a failure; if he opposes the continuance of the war for the maintenance of the Union, why, I suppose he means what he is doing; and that is, to give aid and comfort to the enemy. I know the gentleman's party voted—

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. The Democratic party at Chicago has been very frequently the subject of charges like that brought by the gentleman. It has been frequently charged that the Democratic party declared that the war was an entire failure and insisted that it should be immediately stopped. They took no such position in their platform.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, sir, it is not worth while for us to discuss the platform of the Chicago convention. The people of the country understand it very well, and have delivered their verdict upon it.

This is getting off from the subject I was discussing, which was suffrage in the District of Columbia, and the topic immediately under discussion was the vote which was had here. I remarked, and I believe it is a true remark, that every sympathizer with the rebels in the District of Columbia who was entitled to vote on that day went to the polls and did vote against negro suffrage, while I do know that it was generally understood among the friends of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia that the election was a mockery and a farce, that they would stay away from the polls, and would not participate in it at all. What was the result? The result was that those, and those only, voted, who had predetermined against negro suffrage. It was not an expression of the popular will at all; it was not even an expression of the popular will of the white people, saying nothing of the men who were to be affected by the vote.

Why, sir, in other respects colored men are treated by the Government as citizens and as men. I have already alluded to the fact that we compel them to bear arms in support and defense of the Government, and also to that other important fact, that we tax them for the support of the Government. These are the two most essential duties and services rendered by the citizen to his Government, that he contributes of his money and defends it with his arm. Tell me who will, that a man who contributes by his means and his industry to the support of the Government under which he lives, which has not been even the Government of his choice—for he did not come here, he was born here—and who has shed his blood and given his right arm for the support of that same Government—tell me who will, that that man has no right to a voice in the choice of his rulers, and has no lot or part in the Government.

Sir, it seems to me to be strange that we should be under the necessity of standing here at this day, past the meridian of the nineteenth century, after such a war as we have just gone through for the maintenance of those principles, and have to argue at length upon the right of man to self-government. Why, are the dark ages coming again? Is the sun enshrouded? Are we just entering upon a season of gloom? Are the minds and hearts of men becoming clouded? Is justice dying? It would seem so. It is so simple a question, so plainly enunciated, one that we have fought for so long, the right of man to self-government.

Now, I venture to say that when it comes to the question whether we shall remit power to the hands of rebel traitors with white skins the gentleman from New Jersey will be found in favor of doing it, and so will my colleague. I would like to know right here, now, whether they are not in favor of giving to the rebel soldiers who have been fighting against this Government for the last four years the right to vote.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman wish me to answer that question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like an answer from the gentleman, and also from my colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. ROGERS. I am in favor, most emphatically in favor, of the people of the South having the right to vote, and I am most bitterly opposed to that provision of the constitution of Missouri which proscribes half of the population of that State from exercising the elective franchise, upon the ground that they were soldiers in the rebel army. I am for healing the wound that has been cut between the people of the North and the people of the South at once, and having a full representation in the Halls of Congress of every State, that the dead may bury their dead, and the past may go to the past, and that liberty and union may prevail throughout this land as it did before this last revolution. That is my position.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is as I expected.

Mr. ROGERS. I speak for myself, and nobody else.

Mr. MARSHALL. My colleague calls upon me to answer his question. With his permission I will do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will yield to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL. He asks me whether I am in favor of the soldiers who were in the rebel army being allowed now to vote. I will answer him, sir, in this way: I am in favor of an immediate restoration of the Union. I believe that the right of suffrage rests with the States, and when the southern States return here as law-abiding and loyal States, submitting themselves to the Constitution and laws of the country, I am in favor of leaving it to them to determine, as the Constitution of the country provides, who shall exercise the right of suffrage within their limits; and if the persons to whom my colleague refers are by the constitutions and laws of their own States permitted to vote, then I say we have no right to interfere with that privilege.

And I think that now we should, as has been remarked, let the dead bury their dead; let the past be forgotten, and let us unite as a nation of brethren in burying the animosities of the past, and meet together here, those who have fought in the one army or in the other, if as honest men they are willing to admit their error, come back into the Union, and obey the Constitution and laws. And if they will come back in that spirit, I believe they should be permitted to come, and should be received in the same spirit. That is my answer to the interrogatory of my colleague.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is as I expected, and stripped of its verbiage it simply means that my colleague is in favor of giving to the rebels of the South the right to vote.

Mr. MARSHALL. No, sir, my colleague is mistaken; I am in favor neither of giving nor taking away the right. If they are entitled to vote when the States are restored, under the Constitution and laws of the country, we have no right to prevent them from exercising that privilege.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In other words, we have no right to demand of them security for the future.

Mr. MARSHALL. That was not the question of the gentleman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It resolves itself, then, into the question as to who is best entitled to vote, the loyal black man or the rebel white man. I do not expect that we shall be able to forever prevent the rebel white man from exercising the elective franchise. I suppose many, if not all of them, will vote, sooner or later. I do not expect there is a party strong enough in this country to prevent that. I do not know that it is best to prevent it. I do not propose to discuss that question. But if the question is even worthy of discussion, I say it settles the question that the black man who has been loyal and true to the Union is entitled to that privilege. Can there be any doubt or hesitation upon that point? Here is one person who has been for four years fighting for the Government; here is another who has been fighting against it. The one has been trying to build up and sustain the Government; the other has been trying to pull down and destroy the very Government we are here to legislate for. Yet gentlemen upon the other side of the House are in favor of giving the right of suffrage to those who have been trying to pull down and destroy the Government, and withhold it from those who have been striving to uphold and sustain it. For my own part, there can be no compromise of this question.

I say that the loyal black man, who has been true to his country, shall, here and everywhere, whether in these Halls or at home, whether in or out of Congress, have my voice, my hand, my heart, and my brain in favor of endowing him with the right of suffrage. And I say that the American people, after the struggle they have just passed through, will act criminally, suicidally, if they do not at this time secure to these men the rights of human nature.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman state whether or not there is a provision in the constitution of the State of Illinois against negroes taking up their residence in that State?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to answering the gentleman. A Democratic convention in Illinois, in 1848, inserted a provision in the constitution requiring the Legislature of that State to pass laws to prevent the immigration of free colored persons into that State. The Legislature have never passed any such laws since then, and some laws of that character, which were upon the statute-book before that constitutional provision was adopted have since been repealed.

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the gentleman whether in 1862 a proposition was submitted to the people in regard to allowing negroes the right of suffrage, and whether the people of the State did not vote to prohibit them from having any such right by a vote of one hundred thousand, and over two thirds of the soldiers of Illinois in the Union army voted in the same way?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, Illinois has done a great many mean things. [Laughter.] We used to have a Democratic Legislature from year to year, Democratic Governors and judges and Congressmen. Illinois used to cast her electoral vote for such men as James Buchanan and Franklin Pierce. She has done several mean things in her day; but she has repented of it, and, thank God! my noble State has a record to-day than which none has a prouder; and, trust my word, she will never be guilty of such injustice again. Illinois has redeemed herself.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] have his time extended, so as to enable him to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I presume there will be no vote taken to-day.

Many MEMBERS. "No!" "No!"

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that no vote will be called for on this subject to-day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is useless, Mr. Speaker, to cite the acts of State Legislatures heretofore passed upon this subject. That is only begging the question. Suffrage has been withheld from the black man up to the present time. If that is any reason why it should longer be withheld from him, then that is a kind of logic which I do not appreciate. Therefore, these citations by gentlemen from the provisions of State constitutions and State laws bearing on this subject have, it seems to me, no pertinence to the question.

I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, that, in my opinion, this Government would be criminally recreant to its high trust if it does not, while it has the power, profit by the lessons of the past—the experience acquired in the last four years in the fiery ordeal of war. We shall be false to our duty if we do not obtain security for the future—not only security against further secession and war, but security for the protection of the rights of men—men of all classes and conditions. Why, sir, I am in almost daily receipt of letters from the South, written by members of State Legislatures, by officers of the Army, by merchants doing business there; and all these men bear the same testimony—that the people of the South are not yet fit to resume their functions in the Union and their relations to the General Government; that to restore the States lately in insurrection to the status which they enjoyed as States before the war would only be putting power into the hands of rebels and traitors, whose hatred of the Union and of Union men has become intensified rather than mollified since the termination of the war; that no Union man, whether white or black, would be able to live in those States one moment after the withdrawal of the troops that now protect them and preserve order. This is the universal testimony.

Only a few days ago, as I am credibly informed, General Grant sent from this city an escort of cavalry and a train of wagons into Virginia—not fifty miles, I believe, from this capital—to remove to the city of Washington a loyal family, consisting of a widow and her children, because they could not live in their home in safety. The husband of this woman, formerly a paymaster in the United States Army, was, since the close of the war, ruthlessly shot down by a returned rebel in the streets of Alexandria. His family, returning to their residence in Virginia, had their house set on fire in the night, with the fiendish expectation and design of burning to death its inmates. General Grant, in accordance with the petition of that widow, sent an escort of cavalry, as I have remarked, to insure the safe transit of herself and her children to the city of Washington. This is the condition of things almost under the very shadow of this Capitol. The men from whom this poor woman and her children have been obliged to flee for their lives are the sort of men whom the gentleman from New Jersey desires to clothe with all the rights of citizenship and sovereignty. These are the men whom he would allow to control the destinies of Virginia and other southern States lately arrayed in arms against the Government, and to take seats upon this floor to control the destinies of this great nation.

I grant, sir, that many of the colored men whom I would enfranchise are poor and ignorant; but we have made them so. We have oppressed them by our laws. We have stolen them from their cradles, and consigned them to helpless slavery. The shackles are now knocked from their limbs, and they emerge from the house of bondage and stand forth as men. Let us now take the next grand step, a step which must commend itself to our judgment and consciences. Let us clothe these men with the rights of freemen and give them the power to protect their rights.

Sir, as I have already remarked, we have passed through a fiery ordeal. There are but few homes within our land that are not made desolate by the loss of a son or a father. The widow and the orphan meet us wherever we turn. The maimed and crippled soldiers of the Republic are everywhere seen. Many fair fields have become cemeteries where molder the remains of the noble men who have laid down their lives in defense of our Government. We thought that we had attained the crisis of our troubles during the progress of the war. But it has been said that the ground-swell of the ocean after the storm is often more dangerous to the mariner than the tempest itself; and I am inclined to think that this is true in reference to the present posture of our national affairs. The storm has apparently subsided; but, sir, if we fail to do our duty now as a nation—and that duty is so simple that a child can understand it; no elaborate argument need enforce it, as no sophistry can conceal it; it is simply to give to one man the same rights that we give to another—if we fail now in this our plain duty as a nation, then the ship of state is in more peril from this ground-swell on which we are riding than it was during the fierce tempest of war. I trust that this Congress will have the firmness and wisdom to guide the old ship safely into the haven of peace and security. This we can do by fixing our eyes upon the guiding star of our fathers—the equal rights of all men.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; whereupon the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France; and An act (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint assistant assessors of internal revenue.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past four o'clock) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present the petition of Orville Burke, late captain in the fourteenth Iowa volunteers, together with numerous others, who subscribe themselves as "old soldiers of the war of 1861, and citizens of Jones county, Iowa," requesting Congress to grant to those who enlisted under the $100 bounty act, $200 bounty when honorably discharged, asserting that, in their opinion, justice requires that those who responded first to the country's call are entitled to at least as much bounty as those who enlisted later, when a draft seemed inevitable. If there be no objection, this petition will be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

It was so referred.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of General John Edwards and sundry other citizens of Arkansas, who represent that the country west of that State is susceptible of sustaining a very dense population, but is now a howling wilderness, and they ask that there may be a Territory established there. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I also present the petition of C. B. Seger, president of the New Orleans, Opelousas, and Great Western Railroad Company; of Thomas Rigby, vice president of the Southern Railroad Company; and of W. M. Wadley, president of the Vicksburg, Shreveport, and Texas Railroad Company of Louisiana, praying for an extension of time within which to complete the various railroads of which the gentlemen whose names I have recited are the representatives and officers. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented the memorial of John R. Brown, of Brooklyn, New York, praying for remuneration for the seizure of the schooner Robert Bruce by the revenue cutter Forward, on the 12th day of March, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of John A. McTavish, father of Alexander McTavish, late captain in the eleventh regiment Massachusetts volunteers, who was killed in battle, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at Marquette harbor, on Lake Superior, and for the improvement of that harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Henry S. Davis, praying for compensation for fitting up the west wing of the Patent Office, a mistake having been made, as he alleges, in the settlement of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A few days since I presented, at the request of their secretary, the petition of the American Free Trade League. Since then I have received a petition with the signatures of the officers of that league, among whom are William C. Bryant, David Dudley Field, and some of the most eminent men in the country. The petition sets forth in very clear and strong language the objections to a protective tariff, starting out with the proposition that every man is entitled to the fruits of his own labor, and should have the right to exchange those fruits for the labor of any other person without any interference by the Government whatever. The petition recognizes the right of taxation, but insists that this taxation should be equal upon all classes of the community. It proceeds to state that the great portion of the laboring people of this country are agriculturists; that they need no protection; that it is impossible by discriminating duties to afford them protection, because the articles produced by them in this country are produced more cheaply than in any other country. The petition insists that a person who, by his labor, produces a bale of cotton has a right to exchange that bale of cotton for two tons of iron if he can make that exchange, and that any legislation laying a duty upon the importation of iron which compels him to exchange his bale of cotton for one ton of iron is prejudicial to his interest, and is special legislation in favor of a particular class. So with the man who raises wheat or corn sufficient to buy two blankets; any legislation which compels him to pay the same for one blanket is injurious to him, partial in its character, and ought not to be tolerated. The petition further goes on to show that by the imposition of high duties the revenues of the country are lessened rather than increased when a discrimination is made. It proceeds to controvert the positions which are taken in favor of a protective tariff, among which is the position that it is to protect the laborers of this country against the pauper labor of Europe. The petitioners say that, so far from this being the case, these very manufacturers who are favored by this legislation are constantly introducing this foreign labor into their establishments to compete with the labor of this country.

The petition concludes with a prayer to Congress that in its legislation no discrimination may be made; that no duties may be laid for the purpose of protection, and suggests that a revenue tariff will afford all the protection that will be necessary; and so it would seem to me at this time. We are now desiring to raise the largest revenue that we can; there are great calls upon the Government for money; we have accumulated a vast debt; and it would seem to me that in the adjustment of any tariff the protection incidentally afforded by collecting the duties necessary to defray the expenses of the Government would be all the protection that any branch of industry ought at this time to require. I commend this petition to the especial attention of the Committee on Finance, to which I move its reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be ordered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That the memorial and other papers of A. T. Spencer and G. S. Hubbard, of Chicago, Illinois, praying compensation for carrying the mails on their line of steamers between Chicago and the ports on Lake Superior, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of George W. Hall and others, owners of the bark "A. 1." of Providence, Rhode Island, praying indemnification for alleged losses occasioned by the seizure of that vessel, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States be authorized to send for persons and papers.

COTTON AGENTS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. NORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and are hereby, directed to inquire as to, and consider the propriety and expediency of, raising a select committee to examine into and investigate the transactions in cotton of the supervising special agents of the Treasury.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 36) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, reported it with amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 66) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of marine insurance companies of New York city, praying for an appropriation for restoring the lights at Cape Florida, Jupiter Inlet, and Cape Canaveral, on the coast of Florida, have directed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. It seems from a communication received from the Light-House Board that all of these works are in process of reconstruction, and that the lights will be lighted within a very few days. I move that the communication from the Light-House Board be published with the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the first section of "An act supplementary to several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1856, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of pension agents by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, reported a bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 56) granting a pension to Mary C. Hamilton, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 22) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Alpheus Fobes, United States pension agent in New York, praying for the passage of a law to refund certain moneys stolen from him; asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying that a pension may be granted to Henry Noland, who served in Captain Crawford's company of Kentucky militia from August 25 to November 5, 1813, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, late Superintendent of the Census, have directed me to ask that they be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, believing that that committee, having the general subject of the public printing in charge, are better judges of the matters alleged in the memorial than the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. McDUGALL. If I understand the matter correctly—the Senator from Rhode Island will correct me if I am wrong—this memorial relates to a compilation of the census returns with regard to the manufacturing interests, which has been published in a particular form by the Department of the Interior, under the name of, and as if compiled by, the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The question is as to how that book on manufactures should have been issued. Mr. Kennedy claims that he compiled the statistics contained in the book, that it is his work as the head of the Census Bureau, and that it pertains to him as a matter of right that it should have been so issued. It seems to me, under these circumstances, that the subject-matter is one that more particularly belongs to the Committee on Manufactures. My impression is that the work should have appeared bearing the name of the person whose labor was employed in preparing it as a body of statistics. It is of importance to us to understand and know who are the statisticians under whose name such works are issued by the Government. That is a department of science of very great importance in politico-economic matters. That Mr. Kennedy is a person conversant with these things we here know. Gentlemen who have been much about Washington know that he has been long familiar with such subjects; and that his name should be connected with this work, instead of the name of Mr. Edmunds, who is not known as a statistician, seems to me eminently proper; and whether that is proper or not is a question which belongs appropriately to the Committee on Manufactures. I trust they will not be discharged from its consideration, or will at least give some reason for making that request.

The report of Mr. SPRAGUE was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to reconsider the vote by which a resolution was passed yesterday ordering the printing of ten thousand extra copies of certain diplomatic correspondence. The reason I make the motion is this: the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] objected to the passage of the resolution, and withdrew his objection on a statement I made, which I find is not strictly correct, although I think substantially so. I stated that this correspondence was supplemental to the documents from the State Department accompanying the President's message, of which the President had ordered the printing of a certain number; that this would be bound in the same volume, making in fact a part of it; and upon that statement the Senator from Illinois withdrew his objection and the resolution was passed. I have been at the State Department, and I find that I was not entirely correct in that statement. This is supplemental to the correspondence that came in a year ago, and of which the President authorized and directed ten thousand copies to be printed. It is the opinion of the State Department that to every person to whom that former correspondence went this should also go; and they think at the Department that it is important for the understanding of our foreign affairs and the vindication of our policy that this should be done. The expense, as I said yesterday, will be about five hundred dollars. If now, after this statement, any Senator objects to the resolution, I am willing to have the resolution reconsidered, though I shall vote in favor of its passage; but if not, I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Several SENATORS. Let it go.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Two days ago a message came from the House of Representatives, requesting the return of a bill which had been sent to the Senate some weeks since, and had been referred to one of its committees. It occurred to me that it might embarrass the business of the Senate to return a bill after it had been read twice and referred to and considered in a committee, without any other action; but I understand since from the Clerk that it is customary to return bills under such circumstances, and I desire to withdraw the motion which I entered to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be returned to the House of Representatives. As I do not wish to retain the bill here when the House of Representatives desire to have control of it, I have no objection to its being sent back to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to reconsider a vote of the Senate directing bill H. R. No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, to be returned to the House of Representatives agreeably to their request. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn. The bill will be returned to the House of Representatives.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. GRIMES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to establish the number and fix the pay of the line and staff officers in the United States Navy.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No.

70) to amend the postal laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of Ruth Ellen Grelaud, widow of John H. Grelaud, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 73) to restore to the Secretary of War the supervisory and appellate powers in relation to the acts and duties of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 75) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia," &c., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 14) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint assistant assessors of internal revenue; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further business of the morning hour to be presented, the Chair will now call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion against the United States, upon which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it was my purpose to submit a very few remarks to the Senate at some time before this resolution passes from its consideration, in reply to what was said yesterday by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON;] but after the Senate adjourned I understood from him that he was to be absent from the city to-day, and as my colleague [Mr. DOOLITTLE] wishes to speak upon the same subject at a future day, and will not be prepared to speak before Wednesday next, I have come to the conclusion; if it meets the views of the Senate, to ask that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until Wednesday next, that my colleague may then have the opportunity to speak, and I will defer speaking until he shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. I made the request of the honorable member because I am obliged to be absent from the city, and I shall go in an hour or two from now, and I am very anxious to hear the reply. I understand the Senator has gratified my request by moving to postpone the subject until some day next week.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, I move that it be postponed until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No.

60, entitled "A bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether he intends to press that bill upon the immediate consideration of the Senate, or whether he merely wishes some formal action on it to-day?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not my intention to press the bill to a vote to-day against the wishes of the Senate, or any member of the Senate. I design to call it up and proceed with it as far as we can. There are some verbal amendments and other amendments recommended by the Judiciary Committee, and I thought perhaps we might act upon these and proceed with it as far as was agreeable to the Senate; but it is not my intention to press a vote upon it to-day against the wishes of any Senator. It will have to be read, and I wish to get it in a position to be acted upon at an early day definitely, not, however, to urge to-day a vote upon it or upon any amendment in it that any Senator desires to consider further than to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With that understanding I have no sort of objection to taking up the bill. The bill as reported by the committee has only been printed this morning, and it is impossible for any Senator to understand very fully its provisions without an opportunity of examining it. I think it one of the most important bills before the body, and therefore it ought not to be pressed hastily; but so far as the Senator has indicated that he proposes to consider it now, of course I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would suggest to the honorable member from Illinois that he had better, perhaps, let this bill lie over until Monday. I was not present in the committee when it was determined to report the bill, and I am obliged to leave here in the course of an hour, and I should like very much to be present when the amendments are considered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that it is substantially the bill which we partially considered in committee when he was present. The committee have made some amendments of a verbal character, none I think affecting the principle of the bill at all; and it was my design to have it called up and read, in order that the Senate might see that it was before it, and not to press a vote upon any amendment to the bill, or the bill generally; against the wishes of any Senator to-day. I presume the Senator from Maryland will have no objection to that; it will get it in a position to attract the attention of the Senate to it, so that we can act upon it at an early day. If, when the bill is read, any of the amendments suggested by the committee are likely to give rise to debate, or there is objection to them, (which I do not presume there will be,) I shall have no objection to its going over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that I shall object to any of the amendments which the committee have reported; but if I understand what was done in committee in relation to the amendment of the bill, they have not reported an amendment which I think should be made. If the honorable Senator does not propose to act on the bill to-day, but merely to act on the amendments which the committee have proposed, I have no objection, certainly, that the bill shall be taken up.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue until otherwise provided for by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States. The President is to be authorized to divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, each containing one or more States, not to exceed twelve in number, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an assistant commissioner for each district, who shall give like bond, receive the same compensation, and perform the same duties prescribed by this act and the act to which it is an amendment. The bureau may, in the discretion of the President, be placed under a Commissioner and assistant commissioners, to be detailed from the Army, in which event each officer so assigned to duty is to serve without increase of pay or allowances.

The Commissioner, with the approval of the President, is to divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in each State, and to assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, is to serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man, is to receive a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum. Each assistant commissioner may employ not exceeding six clerks, one of the third class and five of the first class, and each agent of a sub-district may employ two clerks of the first class. The President of the United States, through the War Department, and the Commissioner, is to extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of the bureau, and the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies; including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medical or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

It is also provided that the President may, for settlement in the manner prescribed by section four of the act to which this is an amendment, reserve from sale or settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not to exceed three million acres of good land in all, the rental named in that section to be determined in such manner as the Commissioner shall by regulation prescribe. It proposes to confirm and make valid the possessory titles granted in pursuance of Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865. The Commissioner, under the direction of the President, is to be empowered to purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts as may be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen dependent upon the Government for support; also to purchase sites and buildings for schools and asylums, to be held as United States property, until the refugees or freedmen shall purchase the same, or they shall be otherwise disposed of by the Commissioner.

Whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons (including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate) are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense, than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it is to be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against.

Any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause; to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both. It is to be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of, and hear and determine, all offenses committed against this provision; and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, may prescribe. This jurisdiction is to cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and is in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after it shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within its limits are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section one, line five, after the word "continue" to insert "in force," so as to read, "that the act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided;" and in line six, after "provided," to strike out "for."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen of section one, before the words "compensation" and "duties," to strike out the word "same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line fifteen, after the word "amendment" to insert the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section four of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President may, for the settlement in the manner prescribed by section four of the act to which this is an amendment, reserve from sale or settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not to exceed three million acres of good land in all, provided the rental named in said section four be determined in such manner as the Commissioner shall by regulation prescribe.

And in lieu of that section to insert the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not exceeding in all three million acres of good land; and the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall cause the same from time to time to be allotted and assigned, in parcels not exceeding forty acres each, to the loyal refugees and freedmen, who shall be protected in the use and enjoyment thereof for such term of time and at such annual rent as may be agreed on between the Commissioner and such refugees or freedmen. The rental shall be based upon a valuation of the land, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, under the direction of the President, by regulation prescribe. At the end of such term, or sooner, if the Commissioner shall assent thereto, the occupants of any parcels so assigned may purchase the land and receive a title thereto from the United States in fee, upon paying therefor the value of the land, ascertained as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section six, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, is hereby empowered to purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts, aforesaid, as may be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen dependent upon the Government for support; also to purchase sites and buildings for schools and asylums, to be held as United States property, until the refugees or freedmen shall purchase the same, or they shall be otherwise disposed of by the Commissioner.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be built suitable asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for the general purposes of this act, out of which payments for said lands shall be made. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands, from time to time, to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the preceding section: Provided always, That the said lands shall not be sold for less than the cost thereof to the United States.

Mr. CLARK. There should be an amendment to that amendment which was agreed upon by the committee but by inadvertence is not reported correctly. A portion of that proviso should be stricken off, and instead of the words "provided always that the said lands shall not be sold for," the words "at a price not" should be inserted, so as to read, "and sold in manner and form provided in the preceding section at a price not less than the cost thereof."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see that a verbal amendment is necessary in the sixth line. It now reads, "and he shall provide or cause to be built suitable asylums and schools." It ought to be "shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that those are all the amendments that are reported from the committee. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is still open for amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The amendments that have been agreed to do not materially change the force and effect of this bill, and therefore there was no question that could very well arise upon any of the proposed amendments. I thought the amendments were better than the original text; but now we have come to the consideration of the bill itself, and I move the postponement of its consideration until Monday next.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not object to that motion, as I gave notice when the bill was called up that I did not design to press it to a vote against the wishes of any member of the Senate to-day; but when we do proceed to the consideration of the bill when it shall come up again, I trust that Senators will have examined it and that we may be prepared to go on with its consideration. I do not mean by that to force a vote upon it on the day that it is called up, but that we shall then consider it and come to a vote as early as shall meet the views of the Senate.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I desire to suggest that the bill as amended ought to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inform the Senator that it is printed as amended. The amendments which we have just adopted are those recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, and they are all in print on the Senator's table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will inquire whether the amendments are printed with the bill and incorporated in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are printed with the bill and in the bill. The usual mode of printing a bill where amendments are reported by a committee is to print the amendments in italics with the bill. The original text of the bill is printed and then the proposed amendments are inserted in italics.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that done in this case?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is done in this case. We have just passed upon the amendments and they have been adopted by the Senate. I presume there is no objection on the part of any one to the amendments. They were made to perfect the bill, and I believe they were thought to be more acceptable to all the members of the committee. There was no disagreement on that subject. Those amendments have now been concurred in, and I have no objection to the bill being postponed until Monday, as moved by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McDUGALL. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that as this is a very important bill, it should be printed as amended, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have repeated once or twice that it is.

Mr. McDUGALL. I understand that. I can detect what is in italics and what is in brackets. It is now printed with the amendments, but it is not printed as amended; and when it comes up for discussion I think it had better be in that form.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection to its being printed as amended, but I think if the Senator from California had looked at the printed bill, he would have seen that it is wholly unnecessary to do that. The amendments are all of an immaterial character, mostly verbal, and where one section is substituted for another there is no change in the principle at all; it is only expressed in a better form. But I have no objection to printing it over again if any Senator desires it. I see no sort of occasion for it, however.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think myself that this is a very important measure, and it will not be a very great expense to print it as amended. I think it should be done with a bill of this kind. It will be more convenient in that shape.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather think the honorable member is mistaken in the object which he has in view. If it is printed as amended, without any designation of what the original bill was, and how far it had been altered, we shall have to turn to the original bill to see what it was, and how the amendments affect it. The bill as printed gives the original bill and the amendments, and we can compare them at once.

Mr. McDUGALL. We have now got the bill with the amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all we want.

Mr. McDUGALL. Now I suggest that we have the bill printed as amended. It is customary in matters of this kind, and is not a novel procedure.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will make another suggestion, and the Senator from California will see that, practically, it would be a useless work to print the bill as amended. The amendments of the committee have now been acted upon in Committee of the Whole; they are not yet adopted in the Senate; and they will have to be acted upon again in the Senate, when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is so. I withdraw the observations that I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, a communication addressed to me by Messrs. John Evans and J. B. Chaffee, as "United States Senators-elect from the State of Colorado," together with the accompanying documents.

Under authority of the act of Congress approved the 21st day of March, 1864, the people of Colorado, through a convention, formed a constitution making provision for a State government, which, when submitted to the qualified voters of the Territory, was rejected. In the summer of 1865 a second convention was called by the executive committees of the several political parties in the Territory, which assembled at Denver on the 8th of August, 1865. On the 12th of that month this convention adopted a State constitution, which was submitted to the people on the 5th of September, 1865, and ratified by a majority of one hundred and fifty-five of the qualified voters. The proceedings in the second instance for the formation of a State government having differed in time and mode from those specified in the act of March 21, 1864, I have declined to issue the proclamation for which provision is made in the fifth section of the law, and therefore submit the question for the consideration and further action of Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 12, 1866.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed. I notice that among the papers is the constitution of this new State in manuscript.

Mr. WADE. Such documents have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am informed by the Senator from Ohio that papers of this kind have heretofore gone to the Committee on Territories. If that be so, I have no desire to depart, in this instance, from the usual course. I supposed that the question of the admission of a State, and of Senators from it, had always gone to the Judiciary Committee, but I have not looked at the precedents. If the Senator from Ohio has, and such papers have heretofore gone to the Committee on Territories, I have no disposition to insist upon a different reference on this occasion.

Mr. WADE. I believe that is the fact, but I have no disposition to change the destination suggested by the Senator. As this case involves some questions of law, I am willing that it shall go to the Judiciary Committee; but I believe the precedents are the other way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the precedents are the other way, I prefer that this case shall take the usual course. I have not looked into the precedents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator vary his motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I desire, by unanimous consent, to introduce a bill for the admission of Colorado, of which no notice has been given.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 61, to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication. I will state that in calling up this bill it is not my intention to press it to a vote or to any definite action upon it further than to have the amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee, which are entirely of a verbal character, acted upon, and then shall be willing that the bill be postponed to a future day. I should like to have the bill read, and those amendments which are entirely verbal disposed of, and then let the bill be postponed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It declares that there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities between the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person who under cover of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by the act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction to be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The district courts of the United States, within their respective districts, are to have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of the act, and also, concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the State or locality where they may be any of the rights secured to them by the act; and if any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced in any State court against any such person, or against any officer, civil or military, or other person, for any arrest or imprisonment, trespasses, or wrongs done or committed, by virtue or under color of authority derived from this act, or the act to "enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau," such defendant is to have the right to remove such cause for trial to the proper district or circuit court in the manner prescribed by the "Act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863. The jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters hereby conferred on the district and circuit courts of the United States is to be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States, so far as such laws are suitable to carry it into effect: but in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, and punish offenses against law, the common law, as modified and changed by the constitution and statutes of the State wherein the court having jurisdiction of the cause, civil or criminal, is held, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall be extended to and govern these courts in the trial and disposition of such cause, and if of a criminal nature, in the infliction of punishment on the party found guilty.

The district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, the commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, with powers of arresting, imprisoning, or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and every other officer who may be specially empowered by the President of the United States, are by the act specially authorized and required, at the expense of the United States, to institute proceedings against all and every person who shall violate its provisions, and cause him or them to be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or territorial court as by the act has cognizance of the offense. With a view to affording reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law, without distinction of race or color, or previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and to the prompt discharge of the duties of the act, it is to be the duty of the circuit courts of the United States and the superior courts of the Territories of the United States, from time to time, to increase the number of commissioners so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with a violation of the act. These commissioners shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and the judges of the superior courts of the Territories, severally and collectively, in term time and vacation, upon satisfactory proof being made, to issue warrants and precepts for arresting and bringing before them all offenders against the provisions of the act, and on examination to discharge, admit to bail, or commit them for trial, as the facts may warrant.

It is to be the duty of all marshals and deputy marshals to obey and execute all warrants and precepts issued under the provisions of the act, when to them directed; and should any marshal or deputy marshal refuse to receive such warrant or other process when tendered, or to use all proper means diligently to execute the same, he is on conviction to be fined in the sum of $1,000, to the use of the person upon whom the accused is alleged to have committed the offense, on the motion of such person, by the circuit or district court for the district of such marshal. And the better to enable the commissioners to execute their duties faithfully and efficiently, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the requirements of the act, they are empowered, within their counties, respectively, to appoint in writing, under their hands, any one or more suitable persons, from time to time, to execute all such warrants and other process as may be issued by them in the lawful performance of their respective duties; and the persons so appointed to execute any warrant or process are to have authority to summon and call to their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of the proper county, or such portion of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged, and to insure a faithful observance of the clause of the Constitution which prohibits slavery, in conformity with the provisions of the act; and these warrants are to run and be executed by those officers anywhere in the State within which they are issued.

Any person who shall knowingly and wilfully obstruct, hinder, or prevent any officer, or other person charged with the execution of any such warrant or process, or any person or persons lawfully assisting him or them, from arresting any person for whose apprehension such warrant or process may have been issued, or shall rescue or attempt to rescue such person from the custody of the officer, other person or persons, or those lawfully assisting, when so arrested pursuant to the authority herein given, or shall aid, abet, or assist any person so arrested, directly or indirectly, to escape from the custody of the officer or other person legally authorized, or shall harbor or conceal any person for whose arrest a warrant or process shall have been issued, so as to prevent his discovery and arrest, after notice or knowledge of the fact that a warrant has been issued for the apprehension of such person, is, for either of these offenses, to be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, by indictment and conviction in the district court of the United States in which the offense may have been committed, or before the proper court of criminal jurisdiction, if committed within any one of the organized Territories of the United States; and in case of the escape of the person for whose arrest such warrant or process was issued, is moreover to forfeit and pay, by way of civil damages, to the party claiming to have been grieved by this act, the sum of $1,000, to be recovered by action of debt, in any of the courts within whose jurisdiction the offense may have been committed.

The district attorneys, the marshals, their deputies, and the clerks of the district and territorial courts, are to be paid for their services the like fees as may be allowed to them for similar services in other cases; and in all cases where the proceedings are before a commission he is to be entitled to a fee of ten dollars in full for his services in each case, inclusive of all services incident to the arrest and examination. The person or persons authorized to execute the process to be issued by such commissioners for the arrest of offenders against the provisions of the act are to be entitled to a fee of five dollars for each person he or they may arrest and take before the commissioner, with such other fees as may be deemed reasonable by the commissioner for such other additional services as may be necessarily performed by him or them, such as attending to the examination, keeping the prisoner in custody, and providing him with food and lodging during his detention, and until the final determination of the commissioner, and in general for performing such other duties as may be required in the premises; such fees to be made up in conformity with the fees usually charged by the officers of the courts of justice within the proper district or county, as near as may be practicable, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, on the certificate of the judge of the district within which the arrest is made, and to be recoverable from the defendant as part of the judgment in case of conviction.

Whenever the President of the United States shall have reason to believe that offenses have been or are likely to be committed against the provisions of the act within any judicial district, he may, in his discretion, direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney, of the district, to attend at such place, within the district, and for such time as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with a violation of the act; and it shall be the duty of every judge or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

And the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, is to have authority to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary, to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of the act.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section two, line two, to strike out the word "cover" and to insert the word "color."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line thirty-three, after the word "cause" to insert the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line ten, after the word "offense" to strike out the words, "on the motion of such person, by the circuit or district court for the district of such marshal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line thirty, after the word "State" to insert the words "or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line eighteen, after the word "person" to insert the word "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line twenty-two, after the word "States" to insert the words "for the district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line six, to strike out the word "commission" and insert the word "commissioner."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that closes the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask the Senate to take up a bill reported from the Committee on Pensions this morning, which is a matter requiring immediate action in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, he recommending it. It is a bill to regulate the appointment of pension agents.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States, wherever, in his judgment, the public interest and the convenience of pensioners require, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint pension agents who are to hold their offices for the term of four years and until their successors shall have been appointed and qualified, and to give bond, with good and sufficient sureties, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; but nothing contained in the bill is to be so construed as to affect any existing office prior to an appointment by the President according to its provisions.

Mr. CLARK. What is the operation of the bill?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Under the present law, the Secretary of the Interior has the right to fix the districts, and appoint agents, and to prescribe the bond and the amount of security to be given by these respective agents. There are some three hundred and forty or three hundred and fifty of them, I believe, appointed and contemplated to be appointed to carry out the pension laws. This bill provides that instead of the Secretary of the Interior having the discretion to appoint these agents and fix the districts, it shall be given to the President, and these agents shall be appointed upon the nomination of the President and confirmation of the Senate. The necessity for this legislation is this: many of these agents were appointed years ago, when the amount to be disbursed was exceedingly small; for instance, the pension agent in my State five years ago did not pay out perhaps $1,500 a year; now, he will pay out $500,000. We propose now to give these appointments to the President, so that he may renominate the present officers, if he chooses, and the Secretary of the Interior may require an additional bond which will secure the amounts disbursed. There is a letter on file, accompanying the bill from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending very strongly the passage of the bill, and sending down to the committee the draft of the bill which we have proposed for adoption by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear that letter read.

Mr. CLARK. Does the bill vacate the present offices?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This bill does not vacate any office, but allows the President, if he chooses, to renominate the present officers, and then the new bonds are to be required. The reasons for it are all given in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior. He considers it very important. He says he does not desire that any office shall be vacated, or any officer turned out; that they are very efficient and very competent, and he has no complaint to make of them, but that the bonds in many instances ought to be increased.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire if the Secretary has not power now to fix the bonds at any rate he pleases. In my own State they give a bond, if I am rightly informed, of $100,000.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That is true of all recent appointments under the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will it not answer the purpose to simply authorize the Secretary of the Interior to require a new bond from these officers? It strikes me, the office is hardly important enough to make it a presidential appointment.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That is the very reason the Secretary of the Interior assigned for this change. He says it is an office worth from two thousand five hundred to three thousand dollars a year almost everywhere, and he thinks it ought to be a presidential appointment, and that these appointments ought to be scrutinized by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no sort of objection to it, but I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the letter has passed from the desk, but it has been sent for and will be here speedily.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. To accommodate Senators, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday, and that the bill and the accompanying documents be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIST OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a list of employés under the Clerk of the House; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the Clerk's annual report of contingent expenses; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to what I consider to be a question of privilege. On yesterday the report of the Secretary of War was presented in answer to a resolution of the House adopted on my motion some days ago. It was read at my request, and I supposed, as a matter of course, that it would appear in this morning's Globe; but it does not appear there. It is a matter of very considerable importance to my constituents.

Now, I think that the report of the Secretary of War should appear in the Globe. I am informed by the reporters of the Globe that it was their intention that that report should appear in the Globe of to-day; but that last evening they were unable to obtain it from the Clerk. I suppose that the Clerk may be directed to-day to furnish the reporters with a copy of it to be printed in the Globe of to-morrow.

The reason I am anxious that the report should appear is this: two years ago it was made the duty of the Secretary of War to appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress where slaves were enlisted—

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a point of order, that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Michigan on this ground: I offered that resolution, and when the response came into the House, I desired to catch the ear of the Speaker; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania obtained the floor, and I had not an opportunity to make a single remark. All I desire now is to make a brief explanation.

Mr. UPSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. About two years ago, by express law, the Secretary of War was directed to appoint a commission in each of the slaveholding States represented in Congress to award just compensation to the owners of slaves who volunteered into the Army. After two years he responds to the inquiry of this House, that he had discriminated between those States, that he has appointed this commission in the States of Maryland and Delaware, and entirely ignored the equally just claims of Missouri and Kentucky. The reason why he does this, he says, is simply that the President has directed him not to appoint a commission in either of those States, a direction made two years ago, and I presume not by the present incumbent. And he says that that direction has not been revoked. I say that the Secretary of War is in direct contempt of the law. He has no discretion in regard to the matter.

He says that the law does not fix the precise time when the commission shall be appointed, and that he can take his own time, wholly disregarding the law. Why, sir, the very fact that the law does not fix a time cuts him off from all discretion in regard to this matter, and it is his duty to appoint these commissions forthwith.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that the gentleman is not making a personal explanation; it is all in reference to the action of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman, under the consent granted to make a personal explanation, has the right to make his speech for an hour.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman said he only wished to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may extend his remarks to an hour if he pleases.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the Chair whether he decides that when a member rises to a personal explanation he may speak for an hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so decide. The gentleman from Kentucky received consent to make a personal explanation in regard to the report of the Secretary of War, and he is now discussing that very question. To be sure, he is indulging in strictures upon the Secretary of War, but the Chair thinks that he is discussing the question.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. It will be recollected, for I have not the resolution or the report before me, that my resolution required an explicit answer in regard to why he had failed to appoint these commissions in the slaveholding States at the time the law was passed; what disposition has been made of the fund; and he answered in substance that the fund was ample when the law was passed to reach all of the loyal claimants; an ample fund to pay off all these claims, I suppose some seven million dollars.

But the Treasury was a little hard pressed. There were more greedy claimants, I suppose, from other States than from Kentucky, or at least Kentucky had suffered so very little during this terrible civil war, or made sacrifices to so small an extent, that her claims might be ignored. But he takes the responsibility, when there was an ample fund, to ignore the claims of Kentucky and Missouri, and appoint commissioners to appropriate the money to the claimants in Maryland and Delaware. Now, sir, I say it is in contempt of the authority of this House and of the law. The direction of the President was what he thought himself governed by. What he was bound to obey was the law of the land, and that directed and pointed out plainly what his duty was. That law was passed by Congress, and has been approved by the President. Now, according to the stand the Secretary of War takes, after two years have elapsed, he does not pretend that he has any intention ever to appoint this commission in Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to state to my colleague [Mr. HARDING] that I had an interview with the Secretary of War upon this very subject last summer and this fall, before Congress met, and he explicitly expressed it to be his opinion that that was the law, and that it was his purpose, together with that of the President, at some time to appoint this commission. I put the question to him, if the money contemplated by that act for the payment of these negroes was not in the hands of the Government for that express purpose, and could not be diverted. He said that that was his opinion, and that it was the purpose of the President to carry out that law; but for some cause or other the present Chief Magistrate had concluded that the time had not exactly arrived for the commission to be appointed in Kentucky. I felt it due, from the interviews I had with the Secretary of War, to make this explanation.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Well, sir, I suppose the Secretary of War will return his thanks to the gentleman. But he has an opportunity to be heard himself, and it was not necessary for the gentleman to volunteer in his defense. He has had ample opportunity. Something like a year ago a resolution of the same character was offered and passed, and in response to that he simply said that he had appointed none, because the President had directed none to be appointed. I do not understand him to say that the present Executive has authorized him to suspend that appointment at all. He does not say anything of that kind, nor do I believe it is the fact. He had some vague direction at some time, I suppose, and upon that he continues to act and intends to act so long as he is Secretary of War. I have no idea that he intends to appoint a commission at all. It is a matter that can be got at in no other way. The law requires it to be done, and until it is done no man can submit evidence of his claim. The action of the Secretary of War is, in a word, discriminating against Kentucky and in favor of Maryland and Delaware; and it is doing it without any pretext for distinction whatever. It is in palpable violation of law, and in contempt of his duty.

Now, sir, our claims have been ignored long enough. It is high time some little measure of justice should be meted out to Kentucky. No State in the Union has made sacrifices to the extent that she has done. Property to the amount of millions of dollars has been sacrificed by military rule and by constitutional amendment, and even this poor pittance, which does not exceed $300 to the owner for the loss of his slave in a loyal State, is withheld, and the law disregarded by the Secretary, from some motive which it is very hard to reconcile with a high and honest purpose to discharge his duty. I ask that the Clerk be directed to furnish the answer of the Secretary of War to the reporters.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and it cannot be done. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] intimates some conflict between the reporters and the Clerk of the House, and the Chair will, therefore, state that when the House orders a document to be printed, it is sent by the Clerk to the Government Printing Office. That is required to be done by law. Therefore it is not in his hands to furnish to the reporters. The reporters may take down any document that is read in the same way they take down the debates, if it is deemed essential to incorporate it in the Globe; or, if a gentleman desires it published, he can have a copy made himself and furnish it to the Globe. The reporters are here for the purpose of reporting the debates. They do not report bills or lengthy documents read in extenso for the information of the House. The Chair only states the well-known usage of the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF GOODS IN BOND.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store or bonded warehouses, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that from and after its passage, and until the 1st day of April, 1866, any goods, wares, or merchandise in bond in any public or private bonded warehouse, upon which the duties are unpaid, may be withdrawn for consumption, and the bonds canceled on payment of the duties and charges prescribed by law; and any goods, wares, or merchandise deposited in bond in any public or private bonded warehouse on and after the 1st day of April aforesaid, and all goods, wares, or merchandise remaining in warehouse in bond on said 1st day of April, may be withdrawn for consumption within one year of the date of original importation; and until the expiration of three years from said date any goods, wares, and merchandise in bond as aforesaid may be withdrawn for consumption on payment of the duties assessed on the original entry and charges, and an additional duty of ten per cent. of the amount of such assessed duties and charges.

The bill further provides that neither this nor any other act shall operate to prevent the exportation of bonded goods, wares, or merchandise from the warehouse within three years from the date of original importation, nor their transportation in bond from the port into which they were originally imported to any other port or ports for the purpose of exportation.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have some explanation. We seem to be extending this matter indefinitely.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have a clause in this bill which will prevent any future applications; but I think there is reason why the present applications should be granted. The disturbed state of the navigation and shipping business has led to a good many of these accidental lapses of time; and the bill contains a provision which will prevent hereafter any such applications being made.

Mr. McRUER. Has this bill been printed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been printed yet.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] if this is not simply a bill extending the time for the withdrawal of goods from warehouses.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. And it lays an additional duty of ten per cent. if they are not withdrawn after this year?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. That is the whole bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The call of committees for reports of a private character having been completed,

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports of a public nature.

BERKELEY AND JEFFERSON COUNTIES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, House resolution No. 17, giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, accompanied by a report.

The joint resolution was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was recommitted.

The call of committees having been concluded, The SPEAKER proceeded to call the States for resolutions.

TAX ON CARRIAGES.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the internal revenue law as authorizes a tax on carriages valued at less than $100.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE introduced a joint resolution relating to the Monroe doctrine; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That in the name of the people of the United States, and in the language of President Monroe in his message of December 2, 1823, we hereby declare that we consider any attempt on the part of European Powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

STATES LATELY IN REBELLION.

Mr. RAYMOND submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House copies of all messages, proclamations, and other documents issued by the provisional governors of any States that may have been proclaimed at any time to be in rebellion; of all acts, ordinances, and resolutions that may have been passed by conventions or by Legislatures held in such States under the authority or at the call of said provisional governors; of all returns of elections for members of such conventions and Legislatures, together with the qualifications required for voters at such elections and for members when elected; together with such other information concerning the public action of such States tending to throw light upon their political condition as may be in his possession.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, it requires unanimous consent for its consideration to-day.

Mr. BROOMALL. I make the point of order that that resolution must go to the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.

Mr. RAYMOND. It is simply a call upon the President for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, as the resolution refers only to the election of members of conventions and Legislatures; it does not refer to the election of members of Congress at all.

Mr. RAYMOND. Do I understand that this resolution lies over under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Unless unanimous consent is given to its consideration on this day.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to this resolution, except to the last clause of it. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to omit that portion of it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I inserted that clause simply because I thought there might be some correspondence or communication between those governors and the Government here, which it might be desirable for this House to have communicated to it.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] to consent to include in his resolution any proclamations issued by the President of the United States, whether the present incumbent of the office or his predecessor, relating to this subject, whether those proclamations were issued directly by the President or through the Secretary of State.

Mr. RAYMOND. I have no objection to that, and will modify my resolution accordingly. The resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House copies of all messages, proclamations, and other documents, issued by the provisional governors of any of the States that may have been proclaimed at any time to be in rebellion; of all acts, ordinances, resolutions, and proceedings of conventions or Legislatures held in such States, under the authority or at the call of said provisional governors; of all returns of election for members of such conventions and Legislatures, together with the qualifications required for voters at such elections, and for members when elected; together with such other information concerning the public action of such States, tending to throw light upon their political condition, as may be in his possession; and to communicate further all proclamations issued by the President of the United States, or his predecessor, relating to this subject, whether issued by him directly or through the Secretary of State, and all papers accompanying the same.

Mr. RAYMOND. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the resolution; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SANITARY COMMISSION FOR WASHINGTON.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of giving to a commission, to be appointed by the President and Senate, so much of the powers of the municipal government of the city of Washington as relates to the police, the sanitary regulations, the paving, cleaning, and control of the streets, and other matters affecting the health, safety, comfort, and convenience of the members of the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not rise to object to this resolution, but to suggest a modification to include the subject of sewerage.

Mr. RAYMOND. I think that subject is included in the term "sanitary regulations."

Mr. COBB. I object to the introduction of the resolution at this time.

TAX UPON HORSE RACING.

Mr. DARLING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a license tax upon all horse races where an admission fee is charged, and also a tax of five per cent. on the gross receipts taken by proprietors at all such races.

TAX ON RELIGIOUS AND SCHOOL BOOKS.

Mr. WARD submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the internal revenue tax on paper, and upon all Bibles, Testaments, and other religious books and publications, and upon all school books used in schools, academies, and colleges.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SANITARY COMMISSION FOR WASHINGTON.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of giving to a commission, to be appointed by the President and Senate, so much of the powers of the municipal government of the city of Washington, as relates to the police, the sanitary regulations, the paving, cleaning, and control of the streets, and other matters affecting the health, safety, comfort, and convenience of the members of the Government of the United States.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF COMPENSATION.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to bring in a bill increasing the compensation of members of Congress and Government employes in this city in proportion to the increased cost of living in this city over what it was at the time the same was fixed, and also the increased cost of living in this city over the cost of living in other cities of the Union.

The question was upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 147, nays 5, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos E. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hiley, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McClure, McKee, McRuer, Myers, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Paine, Parsons, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Sloan, Shinklin, Shellabarger, Sitzes, Stevens, Strouse, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen E. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—147.

NAYS—Messrs. Johnson, Jones, Le Blond, Nicholson, and Samuel J. Randall—5.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Brooks, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Dawson, DeLoach, Delano, Dumont, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Griswold, Harris, Hotchkiss, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kerr, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, O'Neill, Pomeroy, Rousseau, Van Aernam, Voorhees, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, and Wright—30.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO AS A STATE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication addressed to me by Messrs. John Evans and J. B. Chaffee, as "United States Senators-elect from the State of Colorado," together with the accompanying documents.

Under authority of the act of Congress approved the 21st day of March, 1864, the people of Colorado, through a convention, formed a constitution making provision for a State government, which, when submitted to the qualified voters of the Territory, was rejected. In the summer of 1865 a second convention was called by the executive committees of the several political parties in the Territory, which assembled at Denver on the 8th of August, 1865. On the 12th of that month this convention adopted a State constitution, which was submitted to the people on the 5th of September, 1865, and ratified by a majority of one hundred and fifty-five of the qualified voters. The proceedings in the second instance for the formation of a State government having differed in time and mode from those specified in the act of March 21, 1864, I have declined to issue the proclamation for which provision is made in the fifth section of the law, and therefore submit the question for the consideration and further action of Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 12, 1866.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move that this message, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Territories, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The morning hour having expired, the House resumed, as the next business in order, the consideration of the special order, being the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to-day to make no remarks derogatory to the character or the rights of the black man of America. I desire to consider the subject before us in reference not only to the black man but to the white man. I desire to take a broad and comprehensive view of the whole question that lies before us for our consideration, and after examining it briefly, it is true, in all its bearings and merits, to arrive so far as I can to a conclusion which shall do "equal and exact justice to all men."

The bill now under consideration proposes to confer universal and unrestrained suffrage upon all colored citizens of the District of Columbia. We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that the position of the District of Columbia is entirely anomalous in our system. One hundred and twenty-five thousand people, citizens of the United States, residing within this District, have no representation on this floor. They have no rights as citizens except to pay taxes, to elect their own municipal officers, and to be subject to the exclusive control of Congress without appeal. They are bound hand and foot, and in that condition, without the right to be represented on this floor to present their own grievances, they are subject to the caprice or the despotic power of Congress in all respects. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that this condition should be borne in mind; and then, as we trace the history of slavery within this District and within our country, we shall find, perhaps, that there is some reason why we ought to exercise calmness and deliberation in that legislation by which we propose to affect their social and political relations.

When the seat of Government was first established here slavery existed in the States both of Maryland and Virginia, from which the District originally was taken. The people of this District, as citizens of the District, and as former citizens of those States, respectively, held slaves in bondage; and when this Government was organized here, be it acknowledged to its disgrace and its shame, the slave-auctioneer and the auction-block of the slave-pen were institutions in this capital of a free Republic, and men were sold as chattels and hereditary slaves. Thank God! sir, that disgrace has passed away. To-day there breathes here no slave; we hear the clanking of no chain, and the cry of no nasal; for the decree of the American people has gone forth, that not only here, but everywhere throughout the land which our fathers dedicated to freedom, slavery has ceased utterly and forever.

And, sir, the destruction of slavery has resulted from no fault of the northern people. It is the result of the suicidal act of those who themselves held the control and ownership of the slaves. For the perpetuation and extension of that institution, they revolted against the Government, and attempted to overthrow it; they attempted to trample down the Constitution which we love and which we were sworn to support; and during four years and a half of bloody conflict they resisted to the utmost the power of this Government exerted in the defense of its own life.

Sir, slavery in the District of Columbia perished as an incident of the rebellion, when it ought to have perished before as a disgrace to humanity. Slavery elsewhere perished because the rebels attempted to use that institution for the overthrow of our Government; and when they failed in that purpose, they and those who were associated with them in sympathy had to accept fully and unreservedly the consequences of their action.

Now, sir, I have no sympathy whatever with slavery, but I confess that I would under existing circumstances pay some regard to the prejudices of those who from long residence within a slave District, surrounded by all the social effects of a servile system, have acquired, perhaps, a natural repugnance to the elevation to political equality of a class which education had taught them to regard as an inferior race, and whose enfranchisement they would regard as oppressive and insulting.

The case before us is entirely distinct and different from that of States in which the colored population, forming but an unimportant percentage of the entire population, have made no visible impression upon the character of society.

We, sir, of the North made the slaves free and gave them in different States various but limited rights of citizenship.

In some cases we allowed them the right of elective franchise; and yet, notwithstanding the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] if he had then lived, would probably have talked about the insult to our wives and daughters by allowing black men to march up to the polls and cast votes in protection of their freedom, and in pursuance of their rights, I have never there heard of an instance where the white man was shocked at the election polls by being brought into contact with the negro. Many in the State which I represent have exercised that privilege. They have the right to exercise it upon a property qualification, and no one objects to the exercise of it by those who under the law are authorized to do so. In other States, where the elective franchise has been granted to the black man, I have never heard of any such results as those which present themselves to the vivid imagination of the gentleman from New Jersey.

But the case here is different. There the black people constitute but a small percentage of those who deposit their ballots at the polls, while in this city there is a much larger proportion, in consequence of the greater numerical strength of the colored persons in this District who would have the right at the polls to exercise the elective franchise if the bill of my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] shall become a law.

Mr. Speaker, I am frank to say, that with certain reasonable restrictions, which in due time will be offered to the pending bill, I am not opposed to granting the elective franchise to the black men in the District of Columbia. In the year 1860 the black population of this District was about fourteen thousand; but in the year 1862, after the passage of the emancipation act by Congress, slaves, I should say refugees, came here from Maryland and Virginia, adjoining slave States. They congregated in this District and in the immediate vicinity of this city. They have gathered here to such an extent that now nearly thirty thousand of them are embraced within the original limits of the District of Columbia. When I remember that all of those slaves are not domestic slaves, who have been treated well at home, who experienced kindness from their masters, and, in many instances, even shared their fortunes in their humiliation, but are composed of the field hands and plantation slaves, who know no agency of civilization except the lash of the overseer, who come in their ignorance and degradation to the land of freedom to seek protection under the folds of the American flag, I must pause before I can vote to extend to them the rights conferred by this bill.

I have listened for more than twenty years to the teachings of distinguished men upon the effect of African slavery upon the intelligence of the race; and the eminent citizen of Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who has so often spoken on that subject before the audiences of the country, has depicted in glowing and eloquent terms the fact that slavery is so debasing and so degrading in its character as to take away or essentially to impair the attributes of manhood. I submit, sir, if those be the consequences of slavery in regard to that population to which I have adverted, whether it is just or generous, wise or expedient, in reference to the freedmen of the population, or in respect to the white population of this city, that the great number of black men resident in this District should be entitled to the right of unqualified suffrage unrestricted. This Government has the power to impose its own enactments upon the people of this District, but in the exercise of that power we should be magnanimous; and while doing no wrong to the black man, while holding out to him all inducements to culture and education to enable him eventually and intelligently to exercise the right of the elective franchise, I must say, in my honest judgment, after full reflection on the subject, that until they have been so prepared, this highest right of citizenship ought not to be conferred upon them.

I was gratified day before yesterday in listening to the statement of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in regard to the improvement within the last few years in this District of the black race.

I rejoice that they are accumulating property; I rejoice that they are becoming intelligent and respectable, and I would hold forth inducements for others to do likewise, by qualifying the right of suffrage by some rule which shall operate as an incentive to study and to thrift.

And I say this, Mr. Speaker, with full confidence that in that course we shall do no harm to the great principles on which republics should be established. Republican government surely can never rest safely, it can never rest peacefully, upon any foundation save that of the intelligence and virtue of its subjects. No Government, republican in form, was ever prosperous where its people were ignorant and debased. And in this Government, where our fathers paid so much attention to intelligence, to the cultivation of virtue, and to all considerations which should surround and guard the foundations of the Republic, I am sure that we would do dishonor to their memory by conferring the franchise upon men unfitted to receive it and unworthy to exercise it.

I am perfectly aware that in many States we have given the elective franchise to the white man who is debased and ignorant. I regret it, because I think that intelligence ought always, either as to the black or the white man, to be made a test of suffrage. And I glory in the principles that have been established by Massachusetts, which prescribes, not that a man should have money in his purse, not that he should have the proclamation money signed by the authorities of the State of New Jersey, as stated by the Representative from that State, [Mr. ROGERS,] but that he should have in his head a cultivated brain, the ability to read the Constitution of his country, and intelligence to understand his rights as a citizen.

I heard with deep regret the language uttered by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] yesterday, in reference to the comparative rights of the black man and the white man in this country. I have never been one of those who believed that the black man had "no rights that the white man was bound to respect." I believe that the black man in this country is entitled to citizenship, and by virtue of that citizenship is entitled to protection to the full power of this Government wherever he may be found on the face of God's earth; that he has a right to demand that the shield of this Government shall be held over him, and that its powers shall be exerted on his behalf to the same extent as if he were the proudest grandee of the land. But, sir, citizenship is one thing, and the right of suffrage is another and a different thing; and in circumstances such as exist around us I am unwilling that general, universal, unrestricted suffrage should be granted to the black men of this District, as is proposed by the bill under consideration.

I did not rise, Mr. Speaker, with the intention of inflicting a long speech upon this House, but I desired to express my own convictions upon this subject, and to say that I believe by pursuing a just, calm, deliberate course of legislation on this subject we shall be far better fulfilling our duties than by hasty acts which we may hereafter regret.

This whole subject is within the power of Congress, and if we grant restricted privilege to-day, we can extend the exercise of that privilege to-morrow. Public sentiment on this, as on a great many subjects, is a matter of slow growth and development. That is the history of the world. Development upon all great subjects is slow. The development of the globe itself has required countless ages before it was prepared for the introduction of man upon it. When we heard from the lips of the reverend gentleman who recently officiated for the day as Chaplain of this House that God had created the world six thousand years ago, and during that time had governed it well, I thought the gentleman hardly understood the full nature or history of this creation, when, for countless millions of years, a Being all-wise and self-existent has filled all space with the glorious objects of His creative hand, and with exquisite and matchless skill, displayed from age to age, has been fashioning each star and planet to fulfill His purpose; and the earth itself, through its thousands of mutations and its varied order of organic life, to fit it in all things as the home of man, His noblest work, in His own image made; it seemed strange, indeed, that such narrow and restricted views should be uttered of an infinite Creator and an infinite creation, and that so little of the true law of growth, development, and perfection should have been conceived.

And take the progress of the human race through the historic age—kingdoms and empires, systems of social polity, systems of religion, systems of science, have been of no rapid growth, but long centuries intervened between their origin and their overthrow.

The Creator placed man on earth, not for the perfection of the individual, but the race; and therefore He locked up the mysteries of his power in the bosom of the earth and in the depths of the heavens, rendering them invisible to mankind. He made man study those secrets, those mysteries, in order that his genius might be cultivated, his views enlarged, his intellect matured, so that he might gradually rise in the scale of being, and finally attain the full perfection for which his Creator designed him.

Thus Governments, political systems, and political rights have been the subject of study and improvement; changes adapted to the advance of society are made; experiments are tried, based upon reason and upon judgment, and those are safest which, in their gradual introduction, avoid unnecessary violence and convulsion.

I submit, sir, whether it be wise for us now, so suddenly, to alter so entirely the political status of so great a number of the citizens of this District in conferring upon them indiscriminately the right of franchise.

In the remarks which I have submitted to-day I have sought to explain the position which I occupy upon this question to this House and to the country. I do it in no spirit of disregard to the rights of any race, black or white. I do it with reference to the just rights and protection of all; and I am frank to say that I think, in this country, we have had legislation—perhaps too much of it—which looked entirely and exclusively to the rights of classes.

But, sir, I happened some time ago, upon this floor, to address some expression in regard to my own views which has provoked the animadversion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] whom I regret to see is not now in his seat, and to him I intended to address some remarks to-day. I do not wish to do it in his absence, for it would not be respectful to him; and therefore I will decline to say anything upon that portion of the subject, as I had intended to do; but I will reserve the right of answering hereafter the insinuations which he made against me, that I had been forming friendship with the Democratic party or with Democratic principles upon this floor. To say that I have personal friendship with gentlemen upon the other side of the House is to say just what is true. There are many of these gentlemen whom I respect, but differ from them in political opinions. I reserve the right to differ from them, and I shall do it freely and unreservedly. I hold the same right to differ with the sentiments of any gentleman upon this side of the House, and that right I shall exercise with the same determination. I am here as an independent Representative upon this floor, bound by my oath, which my constituents never took, to perform the obligations of my conscience, not theirs, to exercise the rights and to discharge the duties of a Representative according to my judgment, enlightened by application to all the sources from which intelligence and information can be received; and I will discharge that duty without regard to menaces on the one hand or to blandishments on the other.

I shall desire on a future occasion, when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is in his seat, to speak my opinions of representative rights and personal independence.

Mr. CHANLER obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, returned to the House of Representatives, agreeably to its request, bill of the House No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution authorizing the joint committee on reconstruction to send for persons and papers; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House that I may be permitted to record my vote on the question on laying upon the table the resolution affecting the pay of members of Congress. I was unavoidably detained from the House at the time that vote was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RAYMOND in the chair.) The Chair cannot ask that consent at this time, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] being entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will say, then, that if I had been present, I should have voted in favor of laying the resolution upon the table.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, the following language of Alexander Hamilton, in one of his essays (No. 5) in the Federalist, seems most appropriate at this time and to this subject:

"It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of the society against the injustice of the other part.

"Justice is the end of government. It is the end of civil society. It ever has been and ever will be pursued until it be obtained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit.

"In a society in which the stronger faction can readily unite to oppress the weaker, anarchy may as truly be said to reign as in a state of nature, where the weaker individual is not secured against the violence of the stronger."

A fierce and bloody civil war has just ended in the complete triumph of this Government over a rebellion which threatened to destroy it.

An amnesty proclamation has restored the people who were in that rebellion to their rights as citizens of the United States. Peace is re-established, and every function of Government is rapidly being put into practical operation throughout the South. The party in the majority in the Government has introduced this proposed amendment to the laws of Congress regulating this District, and urge its passage—

1. On the ground of justice to the negro.
2. On the ground of safety to the Union.
3. As a necessity.

I do not wish to use the word faction in any other sense than that used by the illustrious Hamilton. But it does seem to me, sir, that if this measure passes into a law we will resemble "a society in which the stronger faction readily unite to oppress the weaker," and "anarchy," for awhile at least, may be looked for as the political consequent of our action. Actuated by a sincere wish to do full justice to all classes and races of men; resolved at all hazards to secure the safety and perpetuity of this Union; and after a fair examination of the necessity of the proposed amendment, I am convinced this measure should not pass.

NEGRO SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

In my opinion, the powers vested in Congress over the District of Columbia, although absolute and exclusive, do not include the right to establish a principle which in itself, ab initio, is fatal to the full and just exercise of the will of the majority of the people of this District or of any State of this Union, and, a fortiori, if it be hostile to the will of a majority of the people of this Union. A majority of the inhabitants of the southern States are negroes, who do not constitute the people, neither in those States nor in the United States. The negro inhabitant is in a minority in every other State except the southern States, and whether he vote or not in the States in which he forms a minority of the inhabitants cannot affect the sovereignty of the people of the United States by overthrowing the supremacy of the white race, through the legal and peaceful medium of the ballot, in any one State. But by the principle of negro suffrage, if once established by the national Congress, the term "the people" will be made to include the negro race throughout the Union, and thereby pervert the intention of the framers of the Constitution as declared in the preamble:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

To secure the rights of and preserve the dominion to their posterity the same framers of the Constitution enacted:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."—Art. I, sec. 4.

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes."—Art. I, sec. 8.

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person."—Art. I, sec. 9.

"To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."—Art. I, sec. 8.

These sections plainly fix the intent of the framers of the Constitution on three points: first, the existence of three distinct races; 1, that of the framers of the Constitution; 2, the Indian race; 3, the slave race or negroes. Second, the dominion of the race who formed the Constitution to be perpetual. Third, homogeneity of the emigrant of that day with the race that formed the Constitution. Fourth, the seat of their dominion to be under the exclusive control of the Government founded by that race. I consider the logic of these sections to be conclusive on the question, "Is this a white man's Government?" Curtis, in his admirable work on the Constitution, sustains this view. He says, (volume two, chapter nine, page 195, also chapter ten, page 286.)

"But who were to be regarded as the people of a State for this purpose [in fixing the right of suffrage] was a question of great magnitude now to be considered. The situation of the country in reference to this, as well as to many other important questions, was peculiar. The streams of immigration which began to flow into it from Europe at the first settlement of the different colonies had been interrupted only by the war of the Revolution. On the return of peace the tide of migration began again to set toward the new States which had risen into existence on the western shores of the Atlantic."

"It appears quite certain that great accessions of population would follow the establishment of free institutions in America, if they should be framed in a liberal and comprehensive spirit."

"The States which had encouraged most such immigration had advanced most rapidly in population, in agriculture, and the arts. There were, too, already in the country many persons of foreign birth who had thoroughly identified themselves with its interests and its fate, who had fought in its battles, or contributed of their means to the cause of its freedom; and some of these men were at this very period high in the councils of the nation, and even occupied places of great importance in the Convention [which framed the Constitution] itself. They had been made citizens of the States in which they resided by the State power of naturalization, and they were in every important sense Americans."

"The people," therefore, who framed the Constitution of the United States were of the white race exclusively, their only point of difference being the period of time at which they had emigrated from Europe. No other race is mentioned in the Convention. The only consideration given to the negro was as a slave in those sections regulating the slave trade and establishing the three-fifths rule of representation. To claim for the negro the position of a citizen of the United States is to violate the whole spirit of the preamble to the Constitution which made the United States a nation.

NEGRO VOTE A NEW QUESTION.

To amend the laws of this District and of the State of Maryland so as to admit the negro race to the exercise of sovereignty with the people of this Union is a new question, and one which demands the gravest consideration in face of the history of this country, where the negro has been an inhabitant for as long a period as the ruling white race—an inhabitant, but not a citizen of this Union. The negro should never be allowed to vote in this District until the majority of the whole people of this Union shall have passed their judgment upon his fitness to hold so great a power at the seat of Government.

The present is not, in my opinion, a proper time to urge this amendment upon the people for their judgment. The comparatively turbulent and distracted condition of the southern States just reorganized under the proclamation of the President, the conflict between the white and black race which public discussion would create, the hinderance to a fair discussion consequent upon the absence of an established press, the exclusion of the representatives of a large portion of the people of this Union from the floor of Congress, and the partisan character of such legislation, all tend to put the passage of this amendment in the category of those public acts of which Hamilton speaks in allusion to the "society in which the stronger faction can readily unite to oppress the weaker." Whatever may be the merit of negro suffrage, the attempt to force it on the country at this, or any future period, in hostility to the existing opinion of the people of the whole Union, can only be successful through violence and despotism. For a majority of this House to ignore the expressed will of the people of this District is tyrannical and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. Then the warning voice of De Tocqueville, who wrote so many truths in regard to democracy in America, may be fulfilled. He says:

"If ever the free institutions of America are destroyed that event may be attributed to the unlimited authority of the majority, which may at some future day urge minorities to desperation and oblige them to have recourse to physical force. Anarchy will be the result, but it will have been brought about by despotism."—Democracy in America, vol. 1, p. 317.

PLEA OF NECESSITY.

The necessity must be absolute and imperative which forces a representative democracy to change the established law and custom regulating the right to vote. None of the arguments presented by the advocates of this measure establish any such necessity. The power of the Government never was greater, never so safe, never so honored at home so respected abroad. Her disbanded volunteer army and navy tell a glorious story of victory, of peace, strength, and security. The skill of her sons in the art of war, the devotion of her daughters in works of charity, the clemency, sagacity, and fearless patriotism of her Chief Magistrate, are the happiest guarantees of the future blessings which, as a nation, we may hope to receive and maintain. The majesty of the law universally meets with the ready homage of a free and enlightened people. The minister of religion is welcomed everywhere as the harbinger of a tolerant and pure faith. Every class and color of men are secure of equality before the law, and no danger threatens the full and harmonious enjoyment of civil and religious liberty throughout the Union. The slave is free, and the freedman fully protected. The reorganization of social and political society, which the late war threw into chaos, is rapidly and satisfactorily taking place. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." "There is no one to make us afraid." Our commerce is again spreading her giant arms, in search of great gain, over every sea and land. The busy marts of men have renewed their hum of eager and restless enterprise. The dominion of the people is secure, and the Union is safe in their hands. Whatever evil the future may have in store, certainly the present is without danger, discord, or apprehension of harm. Why bring a new and inexperienced race into the now compact and homogeneous people by extending the right to vote to the colored man?

SAFETY.

The advocates of this amendment in regard to the colored vote in this District urge that the safety of the Union demands the extension of the franchise to the negro.

Hon. Michael Hahn, of Louisiana, in a speech delivered before the National Equal Suffrage Association of Washington, on Friday, November 17, 1865, says:

"Fellow-citizens, while we strive to secure the object we have in view—the right of suffrage to all American citizens, regardless of color—we must overcome obstacles and difficulties of a serious character which still beset us, and the continued existence of which may threaten to prevent our immediate success. It is necessary, in beginning our work, to see that slavery throughout the land is effectually abolished, and that the freedmen are protected in their freedom, and in all the advantages and privileges inseparable from the condition of freedom. It is a mistaken idea to suppose that slavery is already abolished. The national authority has declared emancipation. The national arms, in a bloody contest against slavery, have triumphed. The legislation against slavery of the country treat slavery as abolished. But I, who come from the South, and have seen the working of the institution for over a quarter of a century, tell you—and I do it regretfully—that slavery in practice and substance still exists."

And again:

"The right of the people to keep and bear arms must be so understood as not to exclude the colored man from the term 'people.'"

And again:

"The only question which now seriously divides the country is that of suffrage. Let us, in hoisting up old sores and putting our house to order, be generous, just, and patriotic, and now, for all time to come, dispose of this question in accordance with the principles of humanity and true republican government. The glorious character of the results to be accomplished, the future harmony of all sections of the country and classes of the people, should induce us to enter the contest for this principle cheerfully, energetically, and boldly. As long as this right is denied there is no peace in the land."

And Hon. B. Gratz Brown, in an address delivered at Turner Hall, St. Louis, Missouri, September 22, 1865, on universal suffrage says:

"Safety was destined to spring from the people."

Again, he says in the same speech:

"Subjection of one race to another, a homogeneity of institutions, can only come of equal rights to all classes, and until there is a homogeneity there will be discord between the sections, threatening renewed civil strife."

Again he says, page 10 of the same speech, speaking in behalf of universal suffrage:

"Have I not then the right to invoke in the cause of universal suffrage all the heroism which this war of liberation has called forth, and all the stern resolve that such noble sacrifice and so great suffering has put into the heart of the people? An equal freedom is the only refuge from an antecedent slavery, universal suffrage the only remedy for disasters that follow from subordinating and disfranchising a race and incorporating it in a free community."

A new era has come that disconnects us from the traditions of that condemned policy. Let us avail ourselves of it by insisting that universal suffrage shall be the monument of universal freedom in all the after time."

Hon. Charles Sumner, in a speech delivered before the Republican State convention in Worcester, Massachusetts, September 14, 1865, "on the national security and the national faith," says:

"Neither the rebellion nor slavery is yet ended. The rebellion has been disarmed, but that is all. Slavery has been abolished in name; but that is all."

NATIONAL SECURITY.

And again:

"Indemnity we renounce; but security we will have. This is the one thing needful."

And again:

"As the national peace and tranquillity depend essentially upon the overthrow of monopoly and tyranny, here is another occasion for a special guarantee against the whole pretension of color." "It is only impartial suffrage that I now claim, without distinction of color, so that there shall be one equal rule for all men. And this, too, must be placed under the safeguard of constitutional law."

And lastly the secret of all this fear is given as follows:

"Another speaker, less frank, thought it policy to accept the present condition of affairs, until the control of the State is restored into the hands of its people and 'to submit for a time to evils which cannot be remedied.' And still another, much more wily, when urging a seeming acceptance of the Union, thus lured his brother conspirators: 'If we act wisely we shall be joined by what is called the Copperhead party, and even by many of the Black Republicans.' Such is the plot, and such is the disastrous alliance plainly foreshadowed. But, thank God! in encouraging his comrades, the conspirator has warned us. Forewarned is forearmed."

The claim to all the privileges of an American citizen was easily to be foreseen as a consequence of the policy which made the negro a soldier during the war against rebellion. The right to secede involved our destruction and forced this Government to destroy secession by abolishing slavery. The rebels, in plotting treason, exposed themselves to the counterplot of abolition, whereby the Union countermined the confederacy and blew up their whole work in a ruin even greater far than they had prepared for us. How far the arming of the slave against his master may be justified ceases to be a question of debate while civil war inaugurated by the master threatens the existence of this Union. But the enlisting the slave as a soldier in the armies of the Union was, in my opinion, unnecessary and unwise. It was a step beyond what was consistent with our system of government. Taking a step further and more hostile to society and government, the advocates of negro equality urge now that the rank of soldier invited the hope, if it did not imply the promise, of equality as a citizen in just reward for sharing the dangers of war. I have always opposed the enlistment of negroes or their race in the armies of the Union on an equality with the white man. But it does not follow that the negro is entitled to a vote as an inalienable right, nor does it follow of right because the Administration, during a civil war of great magnitude, under the plea of military and political necessity, employed him in her armies as an instrument to win his own freedom.

It seems to me, sir, that freedom from slavery and equality before the law are as full a reward as we can justly grant the negro for his recent service in arms. The right to vote carries with it too many and too weighty responsibilities to be ranked in the same class with pensions and bounty money, the only reward of a large class of white Union troops. The black laborer in the recent field of blood is undoubtedly worthy of his hire; but he is not entitled to become the equal of his recent white master in the loyal States, nor to receive a greater reward than his white fellow-soldiers in the Union armies. Nor do I think the equality of the negro has ever been fully and fairly admitted even by the Administration which made use of him during the late struggle. The organization of the colored troops in the Army of the United States was as laborers, and not as soldiers. The course pursued by the late President was evidently intended to avoid the responsibility of pledging equality in peace to negroes who had shared the dangers of war.

I deny that any obligation rests against this Government to do anything more for the negro than has already been done. On what meats doth this Caesar feed that he has grown so great? The white soldier did as much work as he, fought as well, died as bravely, suffered in hospitals and in the field as well as he. More than this, the white soldier fought to liberate the slave, and did do it. The white soldier did more: he fought to preserve institutions and rights endeared to him by every hallowed association; to overthrow the rebellion of his brother against their Commonwealth and glorious Union; to preserve the sovereignty of the people against the conspiracy of a slave aristocracy, if you will; to maintain the fabric of the Government built by their fathers for them and their race in every country of kindred men who, down-trodden and disenfranchised, look to this country as a sure refuge. The white soldier fought as a volunteer, as a responsible, free, and resolute citizen, knowing for what he fought, and generously letting the slave share with him the honor, and bestowing on him more than his share of the profits of the white man's victory over his equal and the negro's master.

FACTS—WHAT HAS BEEN DONE BY THE WAR.

This naturally brings us to a statement of facts as to what has been done by this white man's civil war.

1. Slavery and abolition, twin curses to our peace, have been abolished.
2. Rebellion has been put down, and secession made impossible hereafter.
3. The State governments reorganized in the seceding States.
4. Equality before the law secured to the negro by the conventions of those States.
5. Union of the thirty-six existing States and Territories made perpetual by victory.

BENEFITS.

All the benefits resulting from this state of facts accrue to the black and white man alike in everything except the right to vote, which is not a result of, and never was involved in, the contest which has just been decided between the seceding States and this Government. The dominion over the different races on this continent belongs to the white man by right of conquest, and he will only surrender it to a superior in arms. That dominion is secured to us by the elective franchise, which we have granted to foreigners of our own race, as the highest privilege within our gift, as a return to them in sharing with us the task of subduing the savage and establishing civilization in America. That privilege has been made honorable by the glory which is attached to American arms; by the wisdom which marks American policy; by the purity and simplicity which adorn the American home; by the security enjoyed under the protection of our laws; above all by the refuge from military and hereditary aristocracy extended by it to the oppressed and unfortunate of our own race in Europe.

AMERICAN CIVILIZATION.

American civilization, of which universal suffrage is the corner-stone, is not, as some seem to think, a plan to overthrow European civilization, but on the contrary to secure the blessings of the highest civilization to the humblest emigrant from Europe in this Union. That was the scheme of every European nation and language which sought this continent, under whatever pretext they may have disguised it, and with the exception of a few instances in our history, has been the fixed policy of the European race in America up to the present. It is the great social and political task now laid more heavily than ever on the people of this Union. Nor has the dominion of the European on this continent been without a severe struggle. Each one of the thirteen original colonies, and most of the States formed since the war of independence, bear a sad testimony to the danger and fatigues he suffered, to the long vigil and wearying fast he kept, on the rugged sea-coast and on the desert plain, or in the still more inhospitable forest, where behind every tree a red foe lurked thirsting for blood. It became a war of extermination, race against race, blood for blood, merciless. Civilization, although fighting at great odds, hand to hand, foot to foot, drove the savage before him, disputing every inch of wilderness. And the white man of to-day enjoys the triumph achieved by his race in this prosperous and powerful Union. Scarcely was this victory won over the red man when a new element was thrown into the conflict of civilization against barbarism. A philanthropic priest, Bernal Diaz, induced the Spanish Government and the Pope to sanction the importation of African slaves as laborers. Indian slaves and negro slaves alike bowed to the lash of the white master from the land of the Pequod to the Lake of Mexico. The dominion of the white race was made doubly sure by dividing the laboring class into blacks and Indians, from the intermarriage of whom a still more degraded element has been introduced throughout Central America.

The proud distinction which the white race holds to-day on this continent it has held from the first. It is certain to hold it, under all circumstances, with a master's hand. I have no reason to fear for the result as between the races. There are two beautiful groups in marble, one on either side of the main entrance to the Capitol. One commemorates the discovery of America—Columbus displays the globe in triumph, while at his feet crouches an Indian slave. On the other side, a western pioneer is in a death-grapple with an Indian warrior, while the white man's wife and child and faithful dog watch the fierce but victorious struggle of their champion with their murderous foe, whose scalping-knife was just sharpened for the innocent and weak. Why should we, at this period of our history, disturb the historic monuments and legal bulwarks by which the white man secured and preserves the mastery? Why make it necessary to resort again to violence? By the law of might he first won his dominion, and by it he certainly will maintain it if roused by passion.

CONFLICT OF RACES.

The conflict of the different races may never take place in the same form in which it showed itself at the beginning, but the conflict is inevitable whenever the white race is roused by anger or suspicion. One of the most certain methods of inducing a conflict will be, it seems to me, by establishing equality, social and public, as the negro suffrage proposes.

Were I an enemy of the negro I would do everything to hasten the period when the white laboring classes of this country would feel their instinct for self-preservation stronger than any law, and unite their strength to drive the black as they drove the red man out of their midst as a pestilent and turbulent fellow, disorganizing society and delaying the white man's progress. I claim, sir, that this is a white man's Government, founded by white men to preserve and perpetuate the laws and customs of their race, and to extend the blessing of their civilization to the humblest creature. It is the glory of our tolerant freedom that the benefits to be derived from those laws are shared by all the races and colors of men. The negro race has been civilized, slave though he was, by the benign character of those laws. The Indian to-day is the beneficiary and stipendiary of this white man's Government. The stranger from all lands is welcome here to seek happiness, wealth, and liberty. California is the chosen home of thousands of Chinamen. New England is rapidly becoming populated by negroes and their descendants. While her white sons and daughters seek more genial sections they invite the docile negro to the hospilities of a rugged soil and severe climate. Kansas and the far western States shelter the industrious tribes of the red men by humane and wise laws. Yet, sir, I maintain that this is, nevertheless, a white man's Government; the dominion is his own, in emulation of the models reared by our race, to mark their progress and prompt a noble imitation, found strewn along the highway of history, like the monuments Roman heroes left along the Latin way to rouse their countrymen to deeds of daring conquest; models for which we will look in vain in the fetish worship of the African, or in the bloody rites of the King of Dahomey and his brutish Amazons, or in the inhuman practices of the Aztec, or in the merciless aristocracy of the Peruvian, or in the crude code of the cruel Iroquois or of the wandering Comanche. Although the enjoyment of the benefits of our institutions may be open to all men, still the dominion belongs to the white man alone. It is his Government, to be preserved for his posterity in its purity, and administered with toleration and justice to all races of men who may find a home among us. There is no obligation upon us to surrender the Government into other hands, nor is there any call upon us to share the honors of government with any other race whom we may, from motives of policy, philanthropy, or justice, befriend, protect, or release from slavery.

What disgrace attaches to those refused, and what injustice is done by those who refuse them the right to vote?

DISGRACE AND INJUSTICE.

If the ruling race hold dominion by just, constitutional law, they commit no injustice toward those who by that law are excluded from the right to vote. As "the people" of the United States in the words of the Constitution, the white race and their representatives in Congress, merely execute the established law as handed down to them by the first settlers of this continent, and by those who founded the Government in the spirit and name of independence, the white race fixes no disgrace on the excluded negro or Indian by refusing to give what they received in trust for themselves and their posterity.

Nor does the fact that from motives of policy and generosity the white ruling race admitted negroes in exceptional cases to vote establish the injustice of refusing to extend the same right to any other or every negro in national affairs, or at the national capital. In some instances women have been admitted to the right to vote, but that does not fix disgrace on the fair sex excluded by common practice from the right; it is rather an honor to them that they suffer this "constraint which sweetens liberty."

The right to vote is a political and not a social right. The requirements for an intelligent and capable voter are limited to political-experience, political capacity, a good name, and a legal age.

No disgrace attaches to students of divinity, or law, or medicine who, being under age, cannot vote.

Nor can the man who reads English vote any more understandingly as to his political rights than the man who speaks German but not English, yet reads Greek, or who can speak "all the tongues that Babel cleft the world into," and read no language but Hebrew, or be even deaf and dumb, conversing only by signs and reading by raised letters. If he be of age, sound mind, of good name, he needs no higher merit than being a male white citizen. He may or may not be able to bear arms. He may pay no tax. But why limit the right to vote to male white citizens? Because this is a white man's Government. Because the majority of the people of the United States have so established by law. The sovereign will of "the people" has so decreed in the Constitution. This bill proposes to change that decree.

RULING RACE.

The fact that all but the white male citizens are excluded from voting in the municipal affairs of this District, the seat of Government, is a crowning proof, first, that this is a white man's Government, and second, that there is a ruling race recognized in the practice of that Government. The history of the civilization now established in this country, which has its center here, proclaims the proof. The language and customs of our people proclaim it. The laws written and unwritten proclaim it. The organization of our Government proclaims it. The admission of foreign immigrants of the same race to the same rights as those of the original settlers in the different sections of the continent, and excluding the negro and the Indian from voting in many of the States of the Union, proclaim it. Our literature, arts, and science proclaim it in the names of the illustrious men who grace those departments. This national Capitol, and the beautiful works which adorn it within and without, bear testimony to the identity of American and European art, to the homogeneity of the white race, as well as to the close and unbroken connection between European and American history—the record of the white race exclusively. On the majestic and graceful colonnade at the main entrance of this Capitol, the work of the Italian Persico stands opposite Greenough of Massachusetts's colossal group. Over the entrance to the Senate, the great work of Crawford, son of an Irishman, tells in marble the story of American civilization—how American Liberty crowns with laurel the white sons of her race, while the "feather-cinctured" savage mourns over the grave of his people and the desolation of his hunting-grounds. Hung at the very portals of this Chamber, by the genius of Rogers, of New York, in everlasting bronze, is the tale of suffering and disappointment which Columbus endured before his inspiration found utterance in the glad cry of "Land ahead!" on the coast of San Salvador. Then "westward ho!" came the rush of eastern men, until the poet wrote out the sublime drama of a disenthralled race, and foretold our Union, and its might, majesty, and power.

"There shall be sung another golden age.
The rise of empire and of arts;
Not such as Europe breeds in her decay—
Such as she bred when fresh and young.
Westward the course of empire takes its way."

The drama is not ended. The German, Leutze, by the permission and at the cost of the American people, has recorded the last great scene of this heroic play, and the rich sunset of the Pacific coast at the Golden Gate marks on your walls the limit of the white man's dominion under the flag of this Union in the West. No negro race runs in a parallel line across this continent in rivalry for this dominion. Would that it had the spirit, courage, and tenacity of will to emigrate. I would not mar its plan, nor hinder its hunt after fortune. But the artist, with the æsthetic skill of his nation, has introduced a negro into this great picture—the happy, humble companion of the white men's progress, carrying his fiddle to cheer them on their way.

The decorations of this Chamber, the roof emblazoned with American heraldry, and every panel of the rotunda rich in the record of great things done by white men—sometimes painted by the hand of a native artist, sometimes sculptured by the chisel of the European—all relate the same unvarying fact, that this is a white man's Government. The Indian, as he has often been our equal in war, sometimes shares the glories of our triumphs, yields to the wisdom of Penn., or rescues the sturdy seaman from death to proffer him a bride—the negro never.

The same story everywhere reveals the proud deeds of our common ancestry as a white race upon these walls, from pinnacle to foundation-stone, proclaiming the proof of the white man's sole claim to rule, and of his will and strength to do so. This is all by master workmen, who "built better than they knew" in establishing the right of every working man of their race to have, hold, and enjoy, exclusively for themselves and their heirs forever, this citadel of individual liberty, democratic representative government, and universal suffrage. The writing on the wall tells this truth to this people, and he who spurns the lesson it teaches deserves the vengeance and the brand of shame truth bestows on fanatical injustice and falsehood. Sir, I deem the ballot, the bayonet, the steam-engine, and the press, the powers of the nineteenth century. Of these the ballot is the most typical of democratic liberty and strength. I claim it as such for the white race against all the world; and jealously and zealously will I contend for its exclusive use.

THE WHITE MAN'S GOVERNMENT.

This brings us to the merits of this bill introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The burden of proof of course lies with its friends, whose arguments I will endeavor to meet on the spot. This is not a question of class, of caste, of rank, of language, or of color. It is purely a question of race—the dominion which a superior race of men has established for itself over all surrounding or hostile races. There may be many varieties and shades of color of this race from different quarters of the globe, but its identity is as firmly established as the ranges of mountains which traverse the earth's surface, maintaining their individuality from the torrid to the frigid zone.

Sir, I uphold that this is a Government made and maintained by and for the white working man, the white masses of this country. If any doubt exists as to the white democratic original character of this Government this certainly is a proper place and time to remove it:

DEMOCRACY OF THE REVOLUTION OF 1776.

"The social condition of the Americans is eminently democratic. This was its character at the foundation of the colonies, and is still more marked at the present day."—De Tocqueville, vol. 1, p. 37.

"Still, the great proprietors south of the Hudson constituted a superior class, having ideas and tastes of its own, and forming the center of political action. This kind of aristocracy sympathized with the body of the people, whose passions and interests it easily embraced; but it was too weak and too short-lived to excite either love or hatred for itself. This was the class which headed the insurrection in the South in 1776, and furnished the best leaders in the American Revolution.

"At the period of which we are now speaking society was shaken to its center. The people in whose name the struggle had taken place conceived the desire of exercising the authority which it had acquired; its democratic tendencies were awakened; and, having thrown off the yoke of the mother country, it aspired to independence of every kind. The influence of individuals gradually ceased to be felt, and custom and law united together to produce the same result."—Id., vol. 1, p. 38.

"The American institutions are democratic not only in their principles but in their consequences."
"The people, therefore, is the real directing power, and, although the form of government is representative, it is evident that the opinions, the prejudices, the interests, and even the passions of the community are hindered by no durable obstacles from exercising a perpetual influence on society. In the United States the majority governs in the name of the people, as is the case in all the countries in which the people is supreme."—Id., vol. 1, p. 193.

At one time in our national existence the question certainly was raised, and Washington, with true self-respect, manly dignity, and pure patriotism, put aside the crown which a few military aristocrats and blindly-ambitious citizens offered to him. Like Cæsar, he was offered the power to enslave his country; nobler and wiser than Cæsar, he spurned the insult. The hero and father of American independence, he gave back to the people the sovereignty he received from them as dictator.

I believe no other instance occurs in our history as a nation which can throw a shadow upon the otherwise unclouded title of this Union to be ranked as a pure democracy. Washington's conduct in this matter is one of the most positive proofs in our annals of the existence of democracy as a practical working system in the confederation of States, over which during the seven years' war of independence he acted almost as sovereign. Had the people not known their rights, and had they not already been by long experience educated to freedom, this Union never would have been formed. The people, not their leaders, founded and maintained their own independence.

I would consider this statement as conclusive, and rest my argument here as to the democratic character of this Government, but for the manifest disposition of the present Congress to encroach upon the established character and institutions of this Union and its founders. We have new-era men, new-nation men, war-necessity men, peace-necessity men, and centralization men. I wish to pitch the tone of sentiment back to the old democratic cry of the revolutionary era of 1776, and even beyond, far back to the colonial history of this country.

Mr. Speaker, the statesmen of the revolutionary era were not philanthropists, abolitionists, or negro-suffrage men. They were practical representatives of the white democracy which fought out the seven years' war by themselves and for themselves, to establish a white man's democratic representative Government to be perpetuated in this Union. They were practical politicians, dealing with every difficulty with shrewd policy and admirable tact. They mastered every obstacle with hard, sound common sense. They were not abstractionists as a body, and left abstractions to the few fine writers and publicists among them. They knew what the inalienable rights of man were, but they never surrendered the material advantage of slave labor to the inalienable right of the negro. Why? Because they knew by stern experience that the negro did not himself know what his inalienable rights were. He had no political knowledge nor spirit of independence as a race. In their view, independence, just won from the throne of Great Britain by hard blows and indomitable courage and a French alliance, was something else than an abstract idea—it was a very material thing indeed; something to suffer long and keenly for, to die for; something to claim for one's self against kingly power with the sword of a hero, and to maintain when won with the pen of a genius, the grace of a wit, the skill of a statesman, and the profound learning of a jurist. They knew all this from experience. All their wit and wisdom and skill united to devise the laws regulating suffrage. Those laws exclude the negro and recognize him as a slave. Yet the negro had fought under the eye of Washington, beside the heroes whose blood was shed for the common weal of white and black men in the struggle for independence.

INALIENABLE RIGHT.

The Declaration of Independence asserts the inalienable right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I am a believer in and supporter of that fundamental democratic idea. The decision of the founders of this Government certainly does not favor the profoundly suggestive plan of depriving the agricultural white labor of the North, East, and West of a fair chance in the cotton and corn-fields of the South by giving away to freedmen the fattest lands and best cotton-growing region in this continent. Yet the negro had all the inalienable rights then he has to-day. The inalienable right of the negro does not entitle him to vote in this District. An inalienable right is one common to all creatures and derived directly from the Creator; it may be taken away by force, fraud, or accident, yet never is lost; and may be claimed at any time with reason and justice, and is specially valuable to man, in his relations with his fellow-man, as a barrier against injustice and a power for revolution. Justice fixes the relations of all conflicting rights in human affairs, reason establishes their existence, force controls their exercise.

Now, there are many inalienable rights. Self-preservation is the first, and is common to all animals.

The pursuit of liberty, of a home, of happiness, of wealth, are each claimed to be inalienable rights of man.

A child sold into slavery may claim his right to be free at any time in after life, and no just law can deny him the right. But the first fact to be ascertained on the demand of an inalienable right by a claimant, is, first, his free will in making the claim; second, competency to maintain it. So that if a man, woman, or child be either incapable of exercising free will or of maintaining life, liberty, or happiness, or of using such life, liberty, and happiness in accordance with his own well being, or with that of the society in which he or she lives, then both justice and reason may hinder the exercise of the inalienable right, under the very first of all inalienable rights, self-preservation.

RIGHT TO VOTE.

The right to vote is not an inalienable right. It is merely a manner of exercising the right to be free, and belongs to a peculiar set and form of government; has its origin in and is liable to the limitations of civil law. It is not a natural right at all, and is in this country made subordinate to the will of the majority, so that women, minors, and aliens are excluded from its exercise. Yet no disgrace attaches to them in being deprived of the privilege to vote, nor is any injustice committed on them. If the right to vote be, as asserted by some, an inalienable right, it naturally belongs to every human creature who lands on our shores, and should be granted to them without limitation of time or distinction of sex. This is denied by the friends of negro suffrage.

Hon. B. Gratz Brown, in a speech delivered at St. Louis, September 22, 1865, says:

"There are those who seek to escape this conclusion, and put the blush on all free government, by affirming that the right of franchise is a purely political right, neither inherent or inalienable, and may be divested by the citizen or State at will. The consideration before mentioned—that the right of franchise is neither more nor less than the right of self-government, as exercised through a participation in the common government of all—shows that if it be not a natural right, it will be difficult to say in what a natural right consists. Indeed, it is, perhaps, the most natural of any of our rights, inasmuch as it is the denial of all right to personal liberty; for how can such a right exist when the right to maintain it among men and the societies of men is denied? Again, if the right to share in the government over us is not inherent, from whence does it come? Who can give the right to govern another? And how can any give that he has not got? Society is but the aggregate of individuals, and in its authority represents only the conceded limitations on all—not any reservoir of human rights; otherwise it would vary with every changing association. Still, again, if the right of a man, as regards government, can be divested, either by himself or government at will, then government has no limit to its rightful tyranny. It may divest not only one man, but a hundred or a thousand; indeed, why not all but the chosen few or the imperial one, thus arriving logically at oligarchic or despotic rule?"

"Now, a franchise is a political grant of a right, and not a natural right. I repeat it in face of the above avowal to the contrary. The right to vote is a right to will a certain thing. What is that thing? A political duty, a political right, if you prefer the term, if the will is exercised on political subjects; fixed by law in some States, done in a different way in different States. The manner of exercising this political right is the ballot, or by ostracism, or visa voce, or by showing of hands, or by dividing the House, as in Congress and Parliament. Representation is neither a cause nor a consequent of the right to vote. Voting is as old as the history of man. Representation in government is a modern system, and was never known in any Greek republic; not even in Athens, which was a pure democracy. It was unknown in Rome. The right to vote is therefore simply a political or civil right. A vote is a form of expression whereby men give utterance to their will. To say that this particular form of expressing the will is essential to independence over all the other forms of declaring and maintaining independence by a vote, is to subject the will to a formula and destroy independence, which is absurd. To give the form of a vote to those who are devoid of a will, or ignorant of its uses, is unnecessary, unjust, and fatal to freedom. The honorable gentleman, in my judgment, puts the form for the spirit and the love of independence; the desire to vote understandingly for the manner of doing so, and confounds representation with the right to vote, which are distinct things, and not consequent. Nations have been enslaved while in the full enjoyment of the most liberal forms of government. Demosthenes tried in vain to fire the Athenian heart against the Macedonian king. Yet a free exercise of the right to vote banished Demosthenes from Athens, and Greece was enslaved by Philip and his son, leaving all the outer forms of franchise in full force from the Demos up to the Amphictyonic Council.

There are many inalienable rights. But there must be an equivalent force of will and strength of body to establish the claim to an inalienable right. One individual right seems to be that dominion which man has over every beast of the field. And when Peter was bidden to rise and slay and eat, he had full authority to attack the lion, or the bear, or the elephant, of which act of his there is no record. So I take it, each man on this floor has an equally inalienable and a divine right, if you prefer the term, to get his living out of the first wild beast he may chance to meet. But the beast may claim the equally inalienable right of self-defense and eat the man. Sir, the inalienable right of the negro to vote must be asserted and maintained by himself in order to be a valuable and even a safe possession. He must become a democrat in the pure and simple sense in which the white race understand, interpret, and practice it.

WHITE DEMOCRACY.

White democracy does not mean man worship, hero worship, centralization of power, imperial one-man power. It is the very opposite of all this. The individual is absorbed in the mass, and finds safety in the commonwealth. White democracy denies to one man any herediitary right to dominion, and asserts the exclusive sovereignty and instructive wisdom of the masses. White democracy uses its heroes for the people.

White representative democracy founded, in 1776, cemented union for the people with its blood in solemn compact against the hereditary, usurping aristocracy of the white race in all the world, because it was resolved no longer to be ruled by that aristocracy of their own race, and feared no other race. White democracy declares this Union to be made for the people, not the people for the Union. White democracy makes war on every class, caste, and race which assails its sovereignty or would undermine the mastery of the white working man, be he ignorant or learned, strong or weak. Black democracy does not exist. The black race have never asserted and maintained their inalienable right to be a people, anywhere, or at any time. The black race may have petitioned for their inalienable right, but these petitions establish nothing. The blacks have mutinied against authority, have formed and carried out successful insurrections, but they have never established a democratic principle. They have made successful imitations of revolutions in Hayti, and having once begun a revolution they have been revolving in space around a central despotism, a chaotic mass, ever since. They have developed just force and freedom enough to overthrow the white race, a minority in their midst, and by perpetual persecution of that white race have kept themselves in a condition of posse. The proof the blacks of Hayti and the West Indies generally furnish of their capacity for self-government seems to be this: they have learned how to make revolutions. But the principle underlying democracy is peace, permanence, self-contained energy for the development of civilization by a people themselves, without foreign aid or the meretricious aid of a central despotism, or any of the seductive phases of monopoly and protection, or aristocracy.

Toussaint L'Ouverture, so much quoted by the negro-worshipping orators, embodied a negro's pure and simple notion of government when he conceitedly wrote to Napoleon the First and Great, "Toussaint L'Ouverture, first of blacks, salutes Napoleon, the first of whites." The same expression might be majestic in Napoleon and was undoubtedly true of Toussaint L'Ouverture, but would have been fatal to the reputation of Washington, for the reason that his political theory and practice recognized the equality of his fellow-citizens, one to another, and of each to himself. It would have exposed him to universal ridicule for assailing the principle that the ruler is the servant of the people, the distinguishing feature of the white democracy of this Union.

WHITE DEMOCRACY A HOMOGENEOUS RACE.

It is not a thing of to-day, nor of yesterday, but belongs to the history of our race, not only on this continent, but throughout the world, long before. Democracy in Europe and democracy in America may not be identical in practice nor equal in their developments, but their origin is one and the same, and can be traced by the annals of our race running through all the eras of our civilization, from the Germanic tribes, from the Gothic hordes, from the Italian republics, from the Gaul, the Saxon, and the Celt, down to the period of the hegira of the people to America, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, to escape from the dominion of church and state, the hated aristocrat and intolerant bigot of his own race and color. Every European tribe, race, and nation, mingled here in common cause, for civil and religious liberty, against the ruling classes of the Old World. Maryland was a refuge for the English Catholics against the Protestant, and brought toleration with them; Rhode Island was the refuge of the Protestant persecuted by his fellow-Protestant and Puritan brother; Massachusetts was the refuge of the Englishman from the tyranny of a political party in England; South Carolina was a refuge of the Frenchman from the tyranny of a political party in France; Delaware is the western home of the Swede;

New York was the republican outpost of the Dutch republic in their life-long struggle for independence against the empire of Charles V and bigotry of Philip II—a republican colony, founded by a republic in the wilderness of the western world, to carry on the war of popular right against kingly power, intolerance, and commercial monopoly. Her people still cling to those great dogmas of our political faith, and stand true to the principles of public and private right established by that heroic republic of Europe which has defied for ages alike the raging of the sea and the wrath of the tyrant with fearless dignity and untiring industry. The history of this country is the history of our race—the white race. The principles of our Government are peculiar to that race in contradistinction to the African, the Asiatic, and the aboriginal American. Sir, if you doubt this to be a white man's Government, traverse once more the prairies and staked plains across the continent to the Pacific shore, from Oregon to Utah; and if still in doubt, travel on to the shore of Australasia and ask there if the dominion of sea and land is not claimed and held by the white race against all the other sons of Adam.

DOMESTIC EQUALITY ANTECEDENT TO POLITICAL.

If any one denies these propositions, let him seek to establish social equality in his family between the black and white race. The result might prove a success, and may meet with final cooperation from the fair sex and the democracy of the nursery. But I doubt it. Certainly the more simple relations of domestic life should be harmonized; if not to a thorough eradication of all existing prejudice, at least to the same extent as now exists in the domestic relations of the different races of European extraction now united in private and public by every tie which can make a nation homogeneous.

PREJUDICE.

The advantage to the advocates of this amendment, which would follow the experiment of domestic social equality between the black and white races is incalculable. The first victim to the experiment would be prejudice, than which no greater obstacle stands in the way of equality before the law and the full exercise of all the rights of the black man as a voter at the polls, or here as a Representative. But until a large portion of the prejudice be removed by conviction and sound reason, we are bound as legislators to take it into consideration. Prejudice is to the mind what nerves are to the body. It gives impulse to thought and direction to judgment. We feel through our prejudices whatever is mentally offensive or pleasant. It is unreasoning, prompt, perhaps unjust, but decisive. Prejudice in the masses is equivalent to the experience of the philosopher or the quick perceptions of a woman. Prejudice is stronger than opinion, because very few think. There are more prejudiced people than reasonable people. This is practical and plain. Human nature in politics is no way different from human nature in every-day life.

The friend of negro suffrage in a democracy must consult the sentiments of the people. The instinct of the masses is always right. But prejudice is one of the elements of every human being, and is a good element; otherwise it would not hold so high a place in the category of man's characteristics. And I urge domestic intimacy between the advocates of negro suffrage and the candidate for negro suffrage, to remove any unfavorable existing prejudice. In the mean time the enemies to the amendment will watch the process and cling to their prejudice in favor of the white race as the dispensers of power through the ballot. We respect the intense prejudice which preserves our race in its purity, vigor, and supremacy. It is not unjust, for we propose to give the negro equality before the law, and abolish the remnants of slavery now declared unconstitutional by the constitutional number of States of this Union. We are willing that the negro should have every protection which the law can throw around him. but there is a majesty which "hedges in a king." That he ought not to have until he shows himself "every inch a king."

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."
 "Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them."

We are opposed to thrusting honor on the negro. He is to-day, as a race, as dependent on the power and skill of the white race for protection as when he was first brought from Africa. Not one act of theirs has proved the capacity of the black race for self-government. They have neither literature, arts, nor arms, as a race. They have no code of laws, no original organized form of Christian worship. They were introduced upon this continent at the time of the Spanish conquest, in 1520, by express law for their civilization, and have never during all the changes of dynasties or revolution of States risen higher than to be the helpers to the contending parties. They have had the same opportunity as the Indian to secure their independence of the white race, but have never systematically even attempted it on this continent, although they have been educated with equal care and in the same schools as the white man. Their race has been subject to the white man and have submitted to the yoke. The race which rules and is to continue to rule this Union submits to no yoke, nor will it have a divided dominion with a servile race. It would be treachery to the trust reposed in us to do so, and fatal to democracy. All the rights vested in a representative, free system of government would be in jeopardy.

AMERICAN SOVEREIGN.

The only true king possible among us is the white working man. The monarchists clothe their sovereigns with mythical names, saintly titles, and grand insignia—St. George, St. Denis, St. David. But the American sovereign is the white working man—on the farm, in the shop, in the store, in the mine, on land, and at sea. His diadem is the crown of care, his motto industry; in his right hand the badge of his trade, and in his left the scepter of his power, "the ballot." His title is the inalienable right to live free and equal, based on the strong works, on the great deeds of virtue, on the spirit of independence, on the untiring enterprise of his race, and on his own resolve to acknowledge no master but the law and his God. Other kings are Most Catholic, Most Christian, Defender of the Faith, Most Pious, and Most Mighty, and most nearly anything. The American popular sovereign is Most Democratic. He shares his dominion with no other potentate, race, or power. The negro-suffrage bill proposes to limit his exclusive right to rule by establishing the spurious claims of the black prince, clothed in all the majesty of the golden fleece, fobbed from the carcass of dead King Cotton, annealed, housed, buried long ago by the white working man's volunteer forces on land and sea; while his gaudy uniform, tricked off with lace, is emblazoned with orders of nobility granted to the swarthy Duke of Marmalade, Marquis of Sugarplum, and Baron of Daffodil, by their sovereigns, Toussaint L'Ouverture and Emperor Souleouque, two rich sporadic specimens of negro capacity for self-government.

The Indian was reduced to slavery by the first settlers on this continent, from Plymouth Rock to the Isthmus of Darien.

The northern Indian had every difficulty to contend with in the severity of the climate and ruggedness of the soil, and yet the legend of the "Last of the Mohicans" is a romance of the first order, displaying the elements of a great character, wisdom in counsel, bravery in war, and policy in the administration of their peculiar government. To-day some portions of the Indian tribes have adopted the civilization of Europe, and are rich in the possession of a language snatched from barbarism and made one of the written tongues of the earth. But in all their tribes none of them have been found willing to surrender his race to the dominion of the white man without a fight for mastery. Conquered they may be, but cannot be systematically held in bondage, as the African has been for generations. The slavery of the Indian is an exception and full of danger to the owner. The slavery of the African is the rule, safe and profitable to his master, and, if we may judge by his conduct, acceptable to himself. Now, until the negro is at least equal to the Indian, we should refuse him the highest privilege a democracy can grant—the right to vote, and with it the right to be voted for. This may be prejudice, but it looks to be very reasonable.

A FEW PERTINENT QUESTIONS.

In conclusion, this bill seems to me premature. Before surrendering the exclusive right of the race to vote in this District, let me ask a few pertinent questions, and urge an answer from the advocates of this bill before its passage. What gain would the people of the United States experience by extending the voting franchise to the negro race here or elsewhere? What necessity exists for extending this right at this time in this particular city? What advantage do the advocates of this measure propose to themselves by the passage of this law? What will be the effect of negro suffrage in the southern States, first, on the white race; second, on the negro; third, on agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the progress of civilization? What effect will negro suffrage have on internal immigration? What effect on foreign immigration to this city? What examples have we in our own history of the repugnance of the white laborer to compete with slave labor, or its synonym, black labor, uneducated and utterly dependent?

Does negro suffrage if granted give the control of this city to the negro? Have we any reason to anticipate that the dominion of the black race in the southern States or here will be an exception to the usual exercise of power by an ignorant, dominant race, to the exclusion of the rival races? How have negroes heretofore exercised dominion? Does negro suffrage offer a panacea to the evils which belong to the present and past antipathies and collisions between the white and black races? Does it not rather put the black man in new danger? Does it not make him an object of dislike to be put out of the way of the white laborer of the North, East, South, and West? What does General Grant say on this question? What does the press North and South say? What have we to fear from the white race in this city? What have we to hope from the black race if allowed to vote? Will any law of Congress passed at this time remove the future or the existing difficulty which surrounds this question of race?

THE BALLOT AND BANNER AND THE "UNION," EMBLEMS OF OUR RACE.

If, sir, it should ever be your good fortune to visit romantic old Spain, and to enter the fortress and palace of Alhambra, the fairest monument of Moorish grandeur and skill, as this Capitol is the pride of American architecture, you may see cut in stone a hand holding a key, surmounting the horse-shoe arch of the main gateway. They are the three types of strength, speed, and secrecy, the boast of a now fallen Saracen race, sons of that sea of sand, the desert, who carried the glory of Islam to farthest Gades. In an evil hour of civil strife and bitter hatred of faction the Alhambra was betrayed to Spain, "to feed fat an ancient grudge" between political chiefs. The stronghold of the race, with the palace, the sacred courts of justice, and all the rare works of art—the gardens of unrivaled splendor—all that was their own of majesty, strength, and beauty, became the trophies of another.

The legend of the Saracen exile tells the story of penitence and shame; and to the last moment of his sad life he sighs in the sultry desert for the fair home of his ancestors, the gorgeous Alhambra. We, too, are descended from a race of conquerors, who crossed the ocean to establish the glory of civil and religious liberty and secure freedom to themselves and their posterity. To-day we are assembled in the Alhambra of America; here is our citadel; here our courts of highest resort; around these halls cluster the proudest associations of the American people; they seem almost sacred in their eyes. No hostile foot of foreign foe or domestic traitor has trodden them in triumph. Above it floats the flag, the emblem of our Union. That Union is the emblem of the triumphs of the white race. That race rules by the ballot. Shall we surrender the ballot, the emblem of our sovereignty; the flag, the emblem of our Union; the Union, the emblem of our national glory, that they may become the badges of our weakness and the trophies of another race? Never, sir! never, never!

Shall the white laborer bow his free, independent, and honored brow to the level of the negro just set free from slavery, and by yielding the entrance to this great citadel of our nation surrender the mastery of his race over the Representatives of the people, the Senate, and Supreme Court of this Union? Then, sir, the white working man's sovereignty would begin to cease to be. That would be the beginning of the end—

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time may be extended, so as to enable him to conclude his speech.

No objection was made.

Mr. CHANLER. Then the most democratic majesty of American liberty would be humbled in the little dust which was lately raised by a brief campaign of two hundred thousand negro troops, and even they led by white officers; while millions of white soldiers held the field in victory by their own strength and valor. Deny it if ye dare! Sir, I know that this is a white man's Government, and I believe the white working man has the manhood which shall preserve it to his latest posterity, pure and strong in "justice tempered with mercy."

There may be a legend hereafter telling of the exile of Representatives now on this floor, who, in the hour of party spite, betrayed the dominion of their race here, and the stronghold of their people's liberty, to a servile and foreign race.

PARTISAN MAJORITY.

A great deal has been said here about injustice. Injustice to whom? Why, sir, the white population of this District are a part of the people of the United States. They have rights which you should respect and protect. They look to you for justice but not abuse, such as has been poured out on them by the advocates of this measure. The whole question seems to have taken a drift away from justice into the worst form of congressional tyranny and slang—just such tyranny as drove the great men of the Revolution of 1776, headed by Washington, to issue the Declaration of Independence; the same slang that Weddeburne heaped upon Benjamin Franklin at the bar of the British House of Commons. A partisan and arrogant majority are by this bill reenacting in a different form the same outrage which alienated and drove the colonies from the mother country. The Declaration of Independence asserts the prerogative of the governed in face of the tyranny of the Government.

You to-day are nullifying the express will of the people of this District in regard to the question of negro suffrage. In the debate upon this bill, honorable gentlemen stultify their own argument by quoting the Declaration of Independence and the great names of the framers of the Constitution, which they neither imitate nor comprehend. To invoke the shades of Madison, Washington, and their great peers, to witness this scene of petty partisan spite and cold-blooded tyranny, is political blasphemy and high treason against the Constitution and common sense, of none of which do some of these honorable members seem to know anything, or only use to abuse and make ridiculous themselves. This is not a question whether one or several black men shall vote, brave, virtuous, or learned though they be; but it is whether by giving the elective franchise to a whole race you shall deprive a city of the United States, and that, too, the capital of the Union, of its franchise under the Constitution, and subject the majority of the people of this whole District to congressional dictation as to who shall govern them in municipal affairs, after that people have declared under the guarantees of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the sovereignty of the people of this Union, that the white and only true citizens of this District wish to govern themselves in their own way, according to established law, without interference from the national Government, and without complication with political parties. The consent of the governed is not only not respected, but the avowed will of this people is disregarded.

The friends of negro suffrage abstained from voting! What a farce! What sophistry! Do we not all know that by abstaining they forfeit their right to be considered in the matter?

Mr. BINGHAM. I understood the gentleman to say that the colored race had failed to strike for their rights during the late rebellion. I wish to remind the gentleman of the fact, which ought to bring a blush to the cheek of every American citizen, that at the beginning of this great struggle a distinguished general, who, I have no doubt, received the political support of the gentleman himself for the Presidency, and who, then at the head of an American army within the Commonwealth of Virginia, issued his proclamation as general in command of the army, notifying the insurgents in arms against the Constitution that, if their slaves rose in revolt for their liberty he, Major General McClellan, by the whole force of the Army at his command, "would crush them with an iron hand." Yet the gentleman gets up here to-day, after a record of that sort, to cast censure upon this people because they did not strike for their liberties against the combined armies of the Republic and the armies of treason!

Mr. CHANLER. My honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] may have made a good point against General McClellan, but he has made none against me. I admit that they have made successful insurrections, but my argument was not to the effect that the negro race was not capable of the bloodiest deeds. I avoided entering into that question. I asserted that they had made successful insurrection; that they had held the white race under their heel in Hayti and St. Domingo. I would only say, with regard to this question of race, that I assert there is no record of the black race having proved its capacity for self-government as a race; that they have never struck a blow for freedom, and maintained their freedom and independence as individuals when free. I appeal to history, and to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and I speak as a student of history, and the representative of a race whose proudest boast is that their capacity for self-government is the only charter of their liberty. I assail no race; I assail no man. I have taken the greatest pains to prove that the inalienable rights of the black man are as sacred to me as those inalienable rights I have received from my God. If the gentleman misunderstood me, I hope he will accept this explanation. If I have not met his question, I will now yield the floor to him to continue.

Mr. BINGHAM. And I continue thus far, that the gentleman's speech certainly has relation to the rights of the black man within the Republic of the United States. What he may say of their history outside of the jurisdiction of this country, it is not very important for me to take notice of. But inasmuch as the gentleman has seen fit, in his response to what I said, to refer to the testimony of history, I will bear witness now, by the authority of history, that this very race of which he speaks is the only race now existing upon this planet that ever hewed their way out of the prison-house of chattel slavery to the sunlight of personal liberty by their own unaided arm. So much for that part of the gentleman's argument as relates to history.

Mr. CHANLER. Does the gentleman allude now to what has been done in other lands than this? I ask the question because he says he does not like me to go outside of the jurisdiction of this country, and I therefore ask him not to go too far into Africa.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not in Africa. I refer to what the gentleman referred to himself. The insurrection in St. Domingo, I say, stands without a parallel in the history of any race now living on this earth, and I challenge the gentleman to refute that statement from history.

Mr. CHANLER. That is admitted.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is admitted. Then I want to know, with a fact like that conceded, what sort of logic, what sort of force, what sort of reason, what sort of justice is there in the remark of the gentleman made here in a deliberative assembly touching the question of the personal enfranchisement of the black race, when he says in the statement here, right in the face of that fact, that they only are entitled to their liberty who strike the blow for and maintain their liberty? They did strike the blow in Hayti, and did maintain their liberty there. They struck such a blow for liberty there as no other race of men under like circumstances ever before struck, now represented by any organized community upon this planet; and that the gentleman conceded. And yet this sort of argument is to be adduced here as reason why these people in the District of Columbia should not receive the consideration of this House and be protected in their rights as men. If the gentleman's remark is not adduced for that purpose, then it is altogether foreign to our inquiry. If the gentleman can assign any other reason for the introduction of any such argument as that I should like to hear him.

And let me say this much further in explanation: I should like to know of the gentleman with what grace he can come into this House and make a remark of that sort against this race after such a fact as that to which I have before referred is admitted, and after the further fact, in our own history, that the general commanding the Army of the Republic notified these slaves that even if they had the manhood and courage to do all the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] says this people ought to do to entitle them to the enjoyment of their personal rights, Major General McClellan would "crush them with an iron hand" with all the power of the Government, so far as he could command it. I would like to know from my friend from New York whether he favored that gentleman or not, either as a military man or as a political aspirant for the Presidency.

Mr. CHANLER. I will answer that question at a proper time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I suppose so.

Mr. CHANLER. I merely wish to say, in reply to the gentleman, that I have read history a little further back. I remember when the British fleet and the British army held out a similar threat to the white race of this country; but all the armies of Great Britain and all the naval power of that nation did not succeed in keeping down the white race of this country. The proclamation of General McClellan did keep down the negroes; and this fact proves what I assert, that they are a race to be kept under. No race capable of achieving its liberty by its own efforts would have listened for one moment to the paper threats of all the generals in the world. The negroes listened to McClellan and they shrank behind the bush. They are bushmen in Africa. They are a dependent race, unwilling—I assert it from the record of history—unwilling to assert their independence at the risk of their lives. By their own efforts they never have attained, and I firmly believe they never will attain, their liberty. More than that: I assert that if, through the fanatical efforts of the radicals of this country, the negroes be raised to a position of quasi political equality with the whites, I do not believe that they will be able to maintain that position. That, however, is a question upon which I will not now enter. But I assert that the record which the gentleman has quoted is against himself.

Mr. GRINNELL addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] surrendered the floor?

Mr. CHANLER. I have.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for one moment, that I may add a few words in reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRINNELL. I cheerfully yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, and I promise him that I will not abuse it.

I desire to say to the gentleman from New York, when he talks of being a "student of history," that before the tribunal of history the facts are not against me nor against the colored race. I beg leave to say to the gentleman that these people have borne themselves as bravely, as well, and, I may add, as wisely during the great contest just closed, as any people to whom he can point, situated in like circumstances, at any period of the world's history. They were in chains when the rebellion broke out. They constituted but one sixth of the whole body of the people. By the terms of the Constitution of the United States, if they lifted a hand in the assertion of their right to freedom they were liable that moment to be crushed by the combined power of the Republic, called out, in pursuance of the very letter of the Constitution, "to suppress insurrection." Yet, notwithstanding the fact that their whole living generation and the generations before them, running back two centuries, had been enslaved and brutalized, reduced to the sad and miserable condition of chattels, which, for want of a better name, we call a "slave"—an article of merchandise, a thing of trade, with no acknowledged rights in the present and denied even the hope of a heritage in the great hereafter—yet, sir, the moment that the word "Liberty" ran along your ranks, the moment that the word "Emancipation" was emblazoned upon your banners, those men who, with their ancestors, had been enslaved through five generations, rose as one man to stand by this Republic, the last hope of oppressed humanity upon the earth, until they numbered one hundred and seventy-five thousand arraigned in arms under your banners doing firmly, unshrinking, and defiantly their full share in securing the final victory of our arms. I have said this much in defense of men who had the manhood in the hour of the nation's trial to strike for the flag and the unity of the Republic in the tempest of the great conflict, and to stand, where brave men only could stand, on the field of poised battle, where the earthquake and the fire led the charge.

Sir, I am not mistaken; and the record of history, to which I have referred, does not, as the gentleman affirms it does, make against me.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I most confidently anticipated that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] who was so much in fear of a draft, who was so violently opposed to its execution for the putting down of the rebellion, would appear here to-day with his heart swelling with gratitude to the two hundred thousand black soldiers who went forth to fight in the place of himself and others who entertained similar feelings. I am sadly mistaken in the gentleman. So far from this, he proceeds to say that they are now, as a class, dependent as when they were brought from their native wilds in Africa. Sir, I believe if the gentleman were master of all languages, if he were to attempt to put into a sentence the quintessence, the high-wines, and sublimation of an untruth, he could not have more concentrated his language into a libel.

What is the fact, sir? It is perfectly notorious that these four million slaves have not only taken care of themselves amid all the ingenious impediments which tyrants could impose, but they have borne upon their stalwart shoulders their masters, millions of people, for a century. Why, sir, it seemed as impossible for a man to swim the Atlantic with Mount Atlas upon his back, or make harmonious base to the thunders of heaven. But these men have achieved the world's wonder—coming out from the tortures of slavery, from the prison-house, untainted with dishonor or crime; and out of the war free, noble, brave, and more worthy of their friends, always true to the flag.

Mr. Speaker, I happened to have knowledge of the gentleman's own district in the city of New York, and I can hardly forbear saying, as he has drawn the comparison, that hundreds of times there, while a resident of the city, I have been, with a brogue, asked for alms; while in this District, during my years of residence here, I was never accosted by a negro who presented himself as a beggar; and I can but say that the gentleman's statement is a libel upon a race which has established its manhood by fighting our battles.

Mr. Speaker, it was in fable that a man pointed a lion to the picture which represented the king of the forest prostrate, with a man's foot on his neck, and asked what he thought of that. The reply was, "Lions have no painters." For days the unblushing apostles of sham Democracy have in this House drawn pictures of the ignorance and degradation of the people of color in the District of Columbia. Had the subjects of their wanton defamation had a Representative here there would have been a different coloring to the picture, and I would gladly leave their defense to the Representatives of classes who have by hundreds darkened these galleries with their sable countenances, waiting for days to hear the decisive vote which announces that their freedom is not a mockery.

Who are they to whom this bill proposes to give suffrage? They are twenty thousand people, owning twenty-one churches, maintaining thirty-three day schools, and paying taxes on more than one and a quarter million dollars worth of real property. Thirty per cent. of their number were slaves; but the census does not show that there is a Democratic congressional district in the Union where a larger proportion of its population are found attendant at the churches or in the schools.

They did not follow the example of their pale-faced neighbors, to the number of thousands crossing the line to join in the rebellion; but three thousand and more of their number went into the Union Army, nearly one thousand of whom, as soldiers, fell by disease and battle in the room of those who wept on northern soil for rebel defeats, and now decry the manhood and withhold just rights from our true national defenders. This country, with the best Government on earth, which should be the freest from partiality, stands alone by an undemocratic and unjust discrimination based on color. The days of national Democracy being numbered, the southern half having gone off as traitors, it is left for the remnant to establish the new order which will be known as the Cuticle Democracy; and the latest and freshest champion of the faith here is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] who says "that as a race they did far more to sustain the rebellion than to suppress it." I pronounce it a libel. What is the basis of his assertion? On what battlefield was the colored man found confronting the Union Army? In what report of a rebel military general does he find a mention of his prowess? Did they dare arm their slaves? No. It was too well known that they would come to our ranks in regiments; and it was the complaint of one of their generals that thousands of their troops were required to push their slaves into the interior, as a contact with our soldiers was utterly destructive of their cause. If they raised food, it was under the lash, or to satisfy hunger.

In the South they were our friends. In the language of an official dispatch of Secretary Seward to Minister Adams, "Everywhere the American general receives his most useful and reliable information from the negro, who hails his coming as the harbinger of freedom." Not one, but many, of our generals have proclaimed that the negro has gained by the bayonet the ballot. Admiral Du Pont made mention of the negro pilot, Small, who brought out the steamer Planter, mounting a rifled and siege gun, from Charleston as a prize to us under the very guns of the enemy. He brought us the first trophy from Fort Sumter, and information more valuable than the prize.

The celebrated charge of the negro brigade at the conflict at Port Hudson has passed into history, and the testimony of Major General Banks is the most emphatic commendation. I could read numerous military dispatches of the same import.

I hold in my hand the speech of one Thomas Lloyd, president of the board of aldermen of this city, and since he has favored me with this copy, I will give it a passing notice. It is prefaced by a resolution that "the secretary be authorized to have five hundred copies printed for the use of the board, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the board."

This speech is an unfair and untrue representation of the condition of the people of color, such as could not be made by a slave-owner, and but for the official position of the author I should regard it as the fulmination of a "snob." It must be paid for in part by those who are held up to derision and are taxed against their will. What can be more infamous than this resolution, asking the unrepresented to pay for the weapons used for their oppression?

It is only equalled by the decision of Judge Lynch, that the culprit shall furnish rope and gallows fees in advance of the execution; and hardly surpassed by that feature in the Jewish crucifixion, where the martyred Son of God was compelled to bear up the mount unto fainting the cross to which he was nailed. The speech asserts "that the people of color have been granted every right and privilege with reference to the enjoyment of property and the carrying on of business." Protection! This is a city of hackmen of both colors, as it is of distances; but can you at the most profitable hours for business, after nightfall, find a colored hackman near the hotels waiting for employment? No, white vagabonds who vote would cut their harness and maim their horses, driving out the poor colored man, that the gentleman wanting a hack may be compelled to pay dollars for an hour's service; and this is protection!

These people are further described as lazy, thieving, vagrants, and a curse to society. Yet the city orator loves this people, and only fears that if granted suffrage they will be driven out like the Indians; but I must leave this satellite, sure that at no distant day some colored man will unmask his defamer rectus auris.

That they are an inferior race was the argument for their enslavement, and is still employed for their political degradation. If true, we can no more deny them their position as members of the human family than we can deny it to children who do not exhibit the average mental and physical capacity. Their very weakness awakens our sympathy, and prompts us to desire that new hopes may be kindled, and there be a testing of the power of self-reliance.

But there were twelve of the thirteen States before slavery had debauched the nation that made no mention of this inferiority.

Go back to 1789. There was John Jay of New York, Benjamin Franklin of Pennsylvania, and Witherspoon of New Jersey, who advocated the rights of man, and had no fears of negro equality. Two generations pass away, and, shades of the departed! we are refreshed with the logic and patriotism of the gentlemen from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] and from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] What an obscuration of the great Chief Justice Jay, of Witherspoon, the patriot and divine, and Franklin, the philosopher of both hemispheres! What convincing proof of the world's advance and the perfectibility of the human race!

Sir, these moderns shall not deter me from adducing the testimony of Jefferson to the talents of the negro Banneker, whom he invited to visit him at his residence at Monticello; nor that of Dr. Rush, who says of Dr. Derham, a negro, "I found him very learned. I thought

I could give him information concerning the treatment of diseases, but I learned more from him than he could expect from me."

Edward Everett, as late as 1853, testified that a negro youth at Cambridge surpassed as a scholar two youths from Georgia and his own son in the same class, and declared "that the aptitude of the colored race for every kind of intellectual culture was unquestioned." Blumenbach affirms of the negro, there is no savage people who have distinguished themselves by such examples of perfectibility and capacity for scientific cultivation.

There are living illustrations of slaves or the sons of slaves, despite prejudice and disability here, having risen to the highest respectability in the professions. Give them time and opportunity, and remember that the ancestors of the Germans were once barbarians, that Druidism was once the religion of the Britons. Before you decry the negro, remember that your Saxon blood was once enslaved by the Romans, and that not many centuries since your fathers were bought and sold with the soil like the brutes.

The State of Iowa has been used in this debate as an illustration against negro suffrage. It is true that in the dark night of years ago the proud State of my adoption was afflicted with negrophobia, but in the last made Union platform the equality of all men before the law was asserted, and Governor Stone, who indorsed the platform and took the stump in behalf of negro suffrage, was elected over a Union officer and a professed Republican by a majority of sixteen thousand votes. Forget her fall and follow in her reformation. The position of the colored people there reflects lasting honor on their loyalty, and our brave white soldiers would not have me withhold the facts. In the State there were between nine hundred and a thousand people of their class subject to military duty. Of that number more than seven hundred entered the Army. They put to blush the patriotism of the dominant race in all Democratic districts. Seven tenths of a class, without the inducement of commissions as lieutenants, captains, colonels, commissaries, or quartermasters, braving the hate and vengeance of rebels, rushing into the deadly imminent breach in the darkest hour of our struggle! Where is the parallel to this? They had no flag; it was a mockery. There was no pledge of political franchise. Does history cite us to a country where so large a per cent. of the population went forth for the national defense? It was not under the Cæsars; and Harold, in the defense of Britain, left behind him a larger per cent. of the stalwart and the strong. They were more eager to maintain the national honor than the zealots to rescue Jerusalem from the profanation of infidels. Not Frank or Hun, nor Huguenot or Roundhead, or mountaineer, Hungarian, or Pole, exceeded their sacrifices made when tardily accepted. And this is the race now asking our favor.

Those who fought and who pay taxes may be one half the adult male population of this District. Grant that the other half are ignorant, are they not as safe as the whites in sympathy with rebels? Thousands went South as officers, soldiers, and spies from this District. Here it was that a hot-headed traitor gathered his inspiration and found accomplices to murder our President. Loyalty here! I have heard scores for years vent their sympathy with rebels; and nothing but cowardice prevented them entering the rebel ranks. No, I will never prefer a white traitor to a loyalist black.

Mr. Speaker, it will be one of the most joyful occasions of my life to give expression to my gratitude by voting a ballot to those who owed us so little, yet have aided us so faithfully and well. My conscience approves it as a humane act to the millions who for centuries have groaned under a terrible realization that on the side of the oppressor there is power. At any western prairie home for years I sheltered the fleeing bondmen, when a price was set on my head. Human fiends have there, in ambush, sought my life since a member of this House; but I forget all the obloquy and perils of the past, flushed with the hope that we can, by our example, confer substantial blessings on the millions of poor asking for political rights, nature's boon to man.

As an act of justice I know it will meet the approbation of all true patriots who have not decried the arming of the negroes and the emancipation proclamation. With them dwell the moral forces which sustained the war, imparting the martyr-spirit to the hundreds of thousands of the slain, and to those whose prayers gave us the favor of the God of battles. For the disfranchised millions to be skilled in the use of the ballot, it shall be mighty as the sword of Achilles for protection, a pleasing souvenir, supplanting from memory the history of their trials and wrongs, written in tears and blood. We inaugurate the policy of statesmen. Edmund Burke said for the world, "Justice is itself the great standing policy of civil society, and any eminent departure from it, under any circumstances, lies under the suspicion of being no policy at all." Jefferson, the apostle of Democracy, counsels you called statesmen, who have gone after strange gods, and stand shivering in shameful and political wickedness, "Let every man who fights or pays exercise his just and equal right in the election." The late martyred President, who sounded forth the trumpet-call, and never beat a retreat, meditated the joint gift of the ballot to the loyal, and amnesty to the deluded rebels; and Andrew Johnson, who gave the fatal blow to the Cuticle Democracy by a denial that this was "a white man's Government," has promised to be their Moses. For his kindest words ever spoken to the negro in presidential message I thank him, and proffer my humble assistance, that when he reaches his Canaan he may have a ballot as well as a bayonet for the defense of his company against the Pharaohs of the land.

But I take no refuge under the names of the living; and were the testimony of the fathers doubtful, I would turn to the precepts of the golden-rule as the only safe guide for the statesman, with one answer to him who urges his policy in place of justice—"Get thee behind me, Satan;" and if I am to minister to the prejudices of a constituency rather than heed the voice of the Eternal, my answer is, "I would rather be a dog and bay the moon than such a Roman." My purpose is not to leave that heritage of shame to my children, that I forgot those whose blood fed our rivers and crimsoned the sea, and left them outcasts in the "land of the free," preferring white treason to sable loyalty. I rather vote death the penalty for the chief traitor, all honor and reward for our soldiery, and a ballot, safety, and justice for the poor.

Mr. KASSON obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. CONKLING, who moved that the House do now adjourn, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. BIDWELL.

NAVAL WARFARE.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for testing an invention in naval warfare; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, communications have been made to me, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in relation to equalizing bounties of soldiers, and I move that those papers be printed as communicated, and referred to that committee.

It was ordered accordingly.

FREE-TRADE LEAGUE.

Mr. KASSON presented the original petition of the Free-Trade League of New York; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CONKLING renewed the motion to adjourn; which was agreed to.

And then (at five minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 15, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received the following communication from the mayor of the city of Georgetown, District of Columbia, respecting an election recently had in relation to the extension of the right of suffrage to persons of color, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read, as follows:

MAYOR'S OFFICE,

GEORGETOWN, D. C., January 12, 1866.

SIR: I have been instructed by the aldermen and common council of this town to respectfully inform you that our voters were requested to attend the polls—

Mr. GRIMES. I move that that be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not understand that these petitions should be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a letter of the Governor of the Territory of Colorado, transmitting a memorial of colored citizens of that Territory on the subject of the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial of the bishops, elders, and ministers of the African Methodist Episcopal church of the Missouri district, in which they set forth the grievances they are now suffering, and ask Congress to so shape the laws for reconstruction as to secure to the colored man in the several States to be reconstructed civil privileges and political rights and privileges, including the elective franchise, and all other rights to which they are entitled under a republican form of government. This memorial, as I understand, comes from three hundred ordained ministers, representing ninety thousand communicants of the church. It is accompanied by a report of the proceedings of the annual conference. I move the reference of the petition and of the accompanying report to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the memorial of the bishops, elders, and ministers of the African Methodist Episcopal church in the United States, and members of the Indiana district, in annual conference assembled at Springfield, in the State of Illinois, setting forth the wrongs the colored people suffer, particularly in the late rebel States, and asking Congress especially to give them protection through the elective franchise. This memorial proceeds from the representatives of sixty thousand persons, and is signed by the presiding bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal church. It is accompanied by certain papers and a report of the meeting of the conference. I move the reference of the petition and accompanying papers to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Theodore H. Green and other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment of the revenue laws, so as to secure the amplest protection to American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the absolute equality of political as well as civil rights before the law of the single States as well as the Union for all citizens of the United States, to whom belong all persons not excluded by the Constitution; universal suffrage; the prohibition of all class legislation and of all property qualification; the prohibition of all restrictions on free speech, free press, free assemblage, and free instruction; and protection to free intercourse and personal safety; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. RIDDLE presented a memorial of the Wilmington Savings Fund Society, located at Wilmington, Delaware, praying to be relieved from the tax on its deposits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWARD presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of Marquette harbor, on Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE presented the memorial of John Baird, and other Indians of the Oneida tribe, residing near Green Bay, Wisconsin, praying for a grant of a bounty-land warrant of one hundred and sixty acres each, for services rendered by their fathers and other relatives in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to build a breakwater at Marquette Bay, on Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of members of the bar of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, praying that the district of Wisconsin may be transferred from the ninth to the eighth judicial circuit; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Theodore G. Eiswald, of Providence, Rhode Island, praying that the Treasurer of the United States be directed to issue to him two seventy-three United States bonds in lieu of bonds numbered 104,152 and 104,153, of the denomination of $1,000 each, which were burned on the 8th of October, 1865, having been deposited in a stove for safe keeping; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Joseph L. Smith and others, praying that each common school in the country be furnished with the President's annual message and accompanying documents; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Wilson D. Burlingame, late acting master's mate in the United States Navy, and William Peterkin, late acting engineer, United States Navy, officers in charge of the second cutter of the Shamrock, on an expedition with Lieutenant Cushing, of the United States Navy, up the Roanoke river, on the 27th of October, 1864, praying for a distributive share of the prize money resulting from the blowing up of the rebel ram Albemarle; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, soldiers in the Army of the United States under the calls of 1861 and 1862 by the President for troops to put down the rebellion, praying for an equalization of their bounties with those who enlisted at a later period; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the petition of John A. Sutter, one of the earliest, and perhaps the earliest, pioneer and settler of California, who sets forth in his petition all the circumstances connected with his early immigration into that country, and the fact of grants of land having been made to him by the Mexican Government, the impediments found in the way of their confirmation caused by the laws of the United States and the action of citizens of the United States, and asking that compensation may be paid to him for injuries in those respects; and also setting forth the many acts of material hospitality and services rendered by him to the early immigrants to that country. Accompanying the petition there is a statement addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States by the present Governor of California commending the case of John A. Sutter to Congress. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Claims, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I also present the memorial of Colonel Redick McKee, a citizen of California, addressed to the Senate of the United States, setting forth that he occupied the position of commissioner of Indian affairs in that State at an early period, that his accounts have remained unsettled up to the present time, and that he is engaged at this time in an effort to bring about a complete settlement. Accompanying this memorial are memorandums of his accounts. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that the memorial, which is very brief, and the accompanying papers, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition from discharged officers of the late volunteer army, praying that the Veteran Reserve corps be retained as a part of the standing Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GUTHRIE presented a petition of mantua and dress makers of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, praying for the repeal of the internal revenue tax upon mantua and dress making; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE TARIFF QUESTION.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to present a memorial, signed by a number of merchants of St. Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, and Cincinnati, setting forth in very strong terms—and, I believe, no stronger than the truth justifies—the necessity for further protection to the industry of this country. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the revenue laws may be so amended as to afford the amplest protection to American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE. I present the remonstrance of the American Home-Labor League against the petition of the Free-Trade League. This remonstrance is signed by some of the most noted business men, representing almost every profession and occupation, and, as it contains an argument on the subject much better than I can make in presenting the paper, I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to the reading. It is against the rules of the Senate. If we commence the practice in one case, we shall have it to do in all; and if we are to have all the petitions that come here in favor of and against the tariff read, the whole time of the Senate will be occupied in that way.

Mr. WADE. I suppose the matter could be dispatched as quickly in that way as by making a speech accompanying the presentation of the document. Perhaps the Senator would rather hear me speak; if so, he has bad taste. [Laughter.] I do not propose to make a speech. I will only say that the conclusions set forth in the memorial meet my entire approbation, and I shall advocate them on the proper occasion. I wished, for the information of the Senate, that it might be read; but let it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the privilege of taking the vote of the Senate on the question of reading the remonstrance, the rule being that when a paper is presented, if its reading is objected to the sense of the Senate shall be taken upon it without debate. The Chair will put the question if the Senator wishes.

Mr. WADE. I do not care about that. I do not suppose it is very essential.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference, then, will be ordered as the Senator suggests.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have received several communications from manufacturers in different parts of the country growing out of the resolution that I had the honor to propose before the recess, and I desire now to present these communications to the Senate, and have them referred to the Committee on Manufactures. One of them relates to the manufacture of steel, in which it is proved that the internal revenue tax upon the manufacture of steel is greater than the duties levied upon the imported article; and that, unless Congress institutes some remedy, that interest will go out of existence. Another of these communications relates to the manufacture of bronze colors, making the same complaint; another of salt; another of sheet iron; another with reference to cigars, which I will read:

"In consequence of your resolution offered in regard to the tax of internal revenue on home products being smaller than the duties, exchange, &c., please peruse the following: the duty on cigars imported per thousand from Havana is $27 75; the internal revenue tax is $32 25."

Showing an increase of revenue tax over the duty of five dollars per thousand; and he closes with the remark:

"In consequence of which, millions of cigars have arrived from Havana last week, anticipating your raising the duty."

There are a couple of other papers and several printed documents which I have received on this subject and which I now present to the Senate and desire to have referred to the same committee.

Mr. President, I introduced the resolution to which I have referred, on a former occasion, simply as a resolution of inquiry. I did not propose to recommend or to advocate the increase of duties upon imported articles; I desired simply to draw the attention of the Senate, of the House of Representatives, and of the country to the fact that I had ascertained by practical experiment and through practical information derived from channels known to the business men of the country, but which I believed had not been sufficiently considered, that this disparity existed. I desired simply at that moment to raise a voice of warning, a voice of alarm at the existing state of things growing out of the fact, which I had ascertained from these practical experiments and this practical knowledge, that the taxation under the internal revenue system was greater than the duties upon the importation of goods from abroad. It occurred to me that if that state of things were permitted to exist, the manufacturing for this country will be done in England, France, and Germany, instead of the manufacturers of our own country being employed. Why, sir, to-day I can import an article of cotton goods, pay the duty, pay commission, pay the difference of exchange, and sell that article of cotton goods here at the same price it would take me to make it here, in consequence of the increased cost of production in this country growing out of the internal revenue tax directly upon the manufactured fabric and indirectly upon labor and the various articles necessary to be used in the consumption of the manufacturer to enable him to produce the fabric.

Sir, I have no particular interest in any one department of industry in this country—cotton or woolen goods, or iron. The idea which I endeavor to advocate here and elsewhere is, that the manufacturing interest is but one step removed from the agricultural, and that both in common must, of necessity, work together in order to promote the interests of the whole country. I am not one of those who desire, because there may be interests that are seemingly prosperous in my own country, rather to promote the prosperity and interest of another country. I do not believe that those countries across the water, which have occupied the attitude that certain unnamed ones have toward this country for the past four years, are entitled to much of my sympathy, or much of the sympathy of the American people. Sir, when I see petitions brought into this Senate for a system whose sole advocates are those who are in the interest of those people across the water, whose sole advocates in this country are paid by the capitalists of other countries, and, as I am told, are kept up and fostered constantly by means sent from there, I am less inclined to believe in the honesty of the purposes they are endeavoring to advocate.

Sir, the humble individual who now addresses you has come under the criticism of a prominent paper in New York and a distinguished member of the other House; and the simple inquiry that I proposed on a former occasion is held up as being not only a ridiculous assumption, but as something criminal, which ought to have been cried down the moment it was uttered. On that point all I have to say—and I desire to say it here publicly—is that such criticisms and animadversions and complaints, from the sources from which they have come, are desirable to me. If I did not know it in any other way, I know that I am right because they would make me wrong. I know, sir, that the course which these instruments have been pursuing for the last five-and-twenty years is inimical to the liberty, to the prosperity, and to the independence of this people. Sir, for advice as to my public course, I shall not go to Great Britain, or to any of her champions, even those that are the most liberal.

In one of the petitions that have been presented here, the repeal of the corn laws is pointed out as being a great triumph over monopoly, and the American laboring interest is used as a parallel case to the attempt of the friends of the corn laws to continue them. Sir, the repeal of the corn laws of Great Britain was brought about by the manufacturing interest, with Richard Cobden at its head, the most successful manufacturer of his time. He saw plainly that the manufacturing interest of Great Britain could not be sustained except it was by the introduction of cheap bread. The pampered aristocracy and landed estates kept bread high; and yet the manufacturing and laboring interest of this country are pointed out as being in like situation! We, the laborers of this country, are compared to a pampered, aristocratic, landholding organization! Sir, I do not agree with that proposition. I do not agree either to following the path of gentlemen of that stripe, because I believe that it will lead to the destruction of the interests of this country.

The communications were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of Jane W. Nethaway, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. NYE, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Case, surviving partner of the firm of Le Case & Mallet, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 67) to increase and fix the present military establishment of the United States, to report back to the Senate a new draft of the bill. I move that it be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 54) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate a national military and naval asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States," reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) granting certain public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of Iowa, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I am directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads, to report it back with amendments, and if there is no objection I should be glad to have the bill acted on at this time.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

NAVAL EXPEDITION TO CHILI.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing be directed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the publication of the remaining volumes of the Naval Astronomical Expedition to Chili; and that, until the committee report, the publication thereof be suspended.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of restricting all promotion by brevet in all branches and departments of the regular Army to such commissioned officers as have actually served with the armies in the field, and have won such promotion by gallant and highly distinguished conduct in battle, or other conduct of conspicuous merit; and that these titles of distinction be granted only upon the special recommendation or recommendations in the official reports of the commanding officers.

2. That they also be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of so amending existing laws regulating brevet rank and command, as to grant rank, command, and pay to brevet officers after they have been duly commissioned upon an appointment by the President, confirmed by the Senate, without, however, changing their regimental rank and order of promotion in the line of the Army.

3. That they also be instructed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of establishing, with as little delay as possible, a board of the general officers of the Army who have commanded divisions, corps, and armies in the late war, for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the merit of all officers in the regular Army already appointed or nominated for brevet rank, as well as upon the claims of officers not appointed or nominated, and upon making the final report of such board conclusive, so as to revoke all brevet rank that, in their judgment, has not been won by distinguished gallantry in battle or highly meritorious conduct in the field, and upon the propriety of conferring such rank upon all those officers who have won it by gallantry, skill, or generalship in battle or upon the field.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 70) to amend the postal laws, and the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 76) to grant pensions to Walter H. Tinker and John P. McElroy, of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 77) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENTS OF CADETS.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) relating to James J. Wheeler and the appointment of cadets in the Naval and Military Academies; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before this joint resolution is referred, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary character of the facts stated in the papers accompanying it, which I present with it. It seems that a person who has actually served in the rebel army, acting as aid to General Tilghman, in Kentucky, in the early stages of the war, and who during the whole war has been under the surveillance of the Government, who has worn the rebel uniform, is now a cadet at Annapolis in the Naval Academy of the United States. Under the law as it now stands there is no restraint upon the power of a member of Congress to nominate a cadet; at least if there is such a restraint it is not usually exercised. The papers in this case disclose clearly that a young man who is now being educated at the expense of the Government entered into the rebel service at the beginning of the war; that at a later period of the war he was arrested as a spy; that he was discharged, probably on account of his youth, but was continually under the surveillance of the Government until the war closed, when he was appointed a cadet at the Naval Academy, and is now there.

The papers further show that one of the applicants for this position was the son of General James Jackson, one of the most loyal and true men in the country, who was killed I think at the battle of Perryville—an ex-member of Congress, a man of the highest character, a proved hero and statesman. His son was an applicant for the same position. That discretionary power which would enable a man who has fought against his country to be selected as a cadet to be educated at the expense of the Government in preference to the son of a man who gave his life to the service of his country, it seems to me, ought to be taken away. The joint resolution, therefore, provides that Wheeler, the young man who has been appointed, shall be removed from the Naval Academy, and that hereafter no one shall be appointed, either in the Military or Naval Academy, who has taken part in this rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. Who made the appointment?

Mr. SHERMAN. A member of Congress. I do not know the name of the member of Congress, but the young man is from Hopkinsville, Christian county.

Mr. JOHNSON. What State?

Mr. SHERMAN. Kentucky. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the late member of Congress from that district is now minister to Denmark.

Mr. SHERMAN. The appointment was by the present member; I do not know his name. The cadet has just taken his place. It is at any rate a piece of indiscretion.

MILITARY TRIAL OF DAVIS AND CLAY.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by the report of the Secretary of War to the President, dated January 4, instant, it appears that Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called confederate States, is now held in custody, charged with the crimes of having incited the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and with the murder of soldiers of the United States held as prisoners of war during the rebellion, and other cruel and barbarous practices, in violation of the rules and usages of civilized warfare; and whereas by the same report it appears that Clement C. Clay is also held in custody, charged with complicity in said assassination, and with organizing bands of pirates, robbers, and murderers in Canada, to burn the cities and ravage the commerce and coast of the United States on the British frontier, in violation of the same rules and usages; Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That it be respectfully recommended to the President that said Jefferson Davis and Clement C. Clay be, without unnecessary delay, tried by court-martial or military commission upon said charges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the introduction of this joint resolution objected to?

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be received to-day, objection being made.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, on the 14th day of December, 1864, I offered in this body the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas at the commencement of the present rebellion the United States were at peace with all the Governments of the world, and upon terms of comity and good will with Great Britain; and whereas that nation, before the arrival on her soil of our minister, accredited by the Administration of President Lincoln, precipitately acknowledged the rebels as belligerents, thus recognizing their flag upon the ocean, without which recognition it would have been regarded and treated as piratical by all other Powers; and whereas she then proclaimed perfect neutrality between a Republic with which she had entertained friendly relations for upward of a half century and its treasonable subjects; and whereas numbers of her subjects, with the knowledge of her Government, commenced fitting out British fast-sailing ships, loaded with munitions of war, for the purpose of running into our blockaded ports to the rebels, thus furnishing them the means of organizing and continuing the rebellion, and without which it could not have sustained itself six months; and whereas, in addition to the above, and with the knowledge of the Government, British subjects and members of Parliament engaged in the manufacture of piratical English ships, owned by British subjects, manned by British seamen, and sailing under British colors, for the purpose of burning, destroying, and utterly driving from the ocean all peaceful merchant vessels sailing under the United States flag; and whereas many private and unarmed American ships have been burned and destroyed by these pirates from British ports, thus causing great loss and damage to the citizens of the United States; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed immediately to make out a list of each ship and cargoes thus destroyed, with a fair and separate valuation thereon, and interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum, from the date of capture or destruction to the date of presentation, and that he be directed to demand from the British Government payment in full for all ships and cargoes destroyed as aforesaid.

That resolution I offered as a peace measure. I desired that Great Britain should have an opportunity to repudiate the action of her piratical subjects, and to do justice to this nation. I hoped that she would do it; but at any rate I desired that she should fix the future status of neutrals for herself and all other nations when acting as neutrals. The Canadian provincial government took the hint and paid for the piratical depredations committed by Canadian subjects; they paid for the St. Albans robberies; but Great Britain has declined to pay such bills. She has decided that from henceforth the rule of war shall be the torch—that the torch is to be the evidence of her neutrality. She having decided that point, I am content. If she desires that in all future time, whenever she shall be at war, American citizens shall send forth fast-sailing steamers with the torch to illuminate the ocean from the north to the south pole with British commerce, so be it. She has settled the point; I accept her settlement; so be it.

I say, sir, that I offered that resolution as a peace measure. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee made no report; but from the fact that the Secretary of State did precisely what that resolution called upon him to do, to wit, made a demand for payment for the depredations committed by British pirates upon our commerce, I inferred that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations had received assurances from the Secretary of State which satisfied him that no further action was required on the part of Congress at that time. I inferred that that was the case, and the honorable chairman informs me that such was the case. Well, sir, the bill has been presented and payment refused. Not only has payment been refused, but further negotiation has been declined. She has refused, at our suggestion, even to arbitrate our claims, and has insultingly informed this Government that further negotiation is offensive to her. I will read the words of her Foreign Minister of the date of December 2:

"FOREIGN OFFICE, December 2, 1865.

"SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo, having reference to the letter which my predecessor addressed to you on the 3d ultimo."

"There are many statements in your letter which I should be prepared to controvert if it were not that her Majesty's Government consider that no advantage can result from prolonging the controversy," &c.

Her Majesty's Government consider that no advantage can result from prolonging the controversy! I agree with her Majesty's Government; I think that no advantage can accrue from a further prolongation of this controversy. It is well known to her Majesty's Government and to the people of the United States that for more than three months after the last rebel army had laid down its arms the Shenandoah, a British ship, sailing under British colors, manned by British seamen, and firing British guns, was burning our whale ships in the Northern ocean. What was done with this English pirate when she made her appearance in British waters? She was quietly taken possession of by the British Government. These pirates, acknowledged by herself to be pirates, were turned loose without even a reprimand. These British subjects were called upon the deck of the Shenandoah and asked this question: "Michael O'Flanigan, are you a British subject?" "No, by jabsers, I am a Dutchman." [Laughter. The intonation was strongly Irish.] "McDonald, are you a British subject?" "Nau, I am a Spaniard." [Renewed laughter.] And so every one of these men was turned loose without even a reprimand to go again and prey upon American commerce; and now we are informed that further negotiation would be deemed by her Majesty's Government as of no advantage; no good result can follow the prolongation of the controversy. I agree with the British minister that no good result can follow the further continuation of that controversy.

Now, sir, we are informed in that language that no further negotiation is open; the negotiation is closed, and to-day there seems to be just one course for this nation to pursue in accordance with her dignity and her honor, and that is, from this time henceforth and forevermore, until these bills are paid, absolute non-intercourse with Great Britain. True, there are other remedies. We might declare war against Great Britain, and all the world would say we had just cause. We might seize Canada, and say that we would take land in payment if we can get no other redress, and hold it until payment was made, and the world would justify our action. Again, we might declare an embargo, or we might seize her ships wherever found. But, sir, there is a peaceful remedy, and that remedy I propose. I propose that we say to Great Britain, "We agree with you that no further negotiation is desirable in this case; we do not wish any further negotiation; we accept your definition of neutrality." That is the determination of the American people to-day; and I believe—I do not know, but I believe—that Mr. Seward understands that that will be the action of the people of the United States whenever Great Britain gets into a war with other Powers. I believe that he distinctly understands that our people will send fast-sailing steamers to the ends of the earth and make war upon British commerce with the torch until her flag is, as ours has been, swept from the ocean. But, sir, is it manly, is it dignified in this great nation, that has been able to keep a million soldiers in the field for the last four years, to copy after that old man in the Bible, who, offering one hand, said, "Are you at peace, my brother?" while with the other he stabbed him under the fifth rib? No, sir, it is not dignified, nor is it honorable. I propose to say to Great Britain that we accept her definition of neutrality, and that from this time forth until she pays this bill of damages we shall declare non-intercourse with her. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas by the recent publication of the diplomatic correspondence between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, we are fully advised that the last-named Government has refused to repair the damages inflicted upon our commerce by the agency of her subjects during the late rebellion; has declined to arbitrate the same, and, finally, further to treat upon the subject, thus exhausting all diplomatic resources, leaving to this nation but one alternative consistent with its honor: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to withdraw our minister from the court of St. James, and make proclamation of national non-intercourse; which is hereby declared to take effect after such proclamation shall have been issued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the introduction of this joint resolution?

Mr. DIXON. I object; it had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot now be received.

HARBOR AT MICHIGAN CITY.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of land or money to assist in the construction of a harbor at Michigan City, Indiana; to report by bill or otherwise.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

On the motion of Mr. NYE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 66) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

The bill contains a preamble reciting that the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress, in express terms, the power to regulate commerce among the several States, to establish post roads, and to raise and support armies; and provides that every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, shall be authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freights, and property, on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

The Committee on Commerce proposed to amend the bill by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any stipulation between the Government of the United States and any railroad company for transportation or fares, without compensation therefor.

Mr. FOOT. I presume there will be no objection to that amendment. It received the unanimous support of the Committee on Commerce, from whom the bill is reported, and I trust the question will be taken upon the amendment at this time.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. The bill before us presents to our consideration the twofold question of constitutional power and of public expediency. The remarks I propose to submit on the present occasion will be chiefly confined to the consideration of the first branch of the proposition. The same question was before us at the last session, and was debated at some length; and if I mistake not, the last Congress adjourned while my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] was upon the floor, addressing the Senate in opposition to this bill, and no final action was taken upon it. I listened with some attention, and with something of interest, and, I will add, with something of instruction also, to that discussion, and have recently read a considerable portion of it. I have to say, however, that the limited examination I have given to the main question in hand inclines my judgment to a different conclusion from that which has been expressed by some of my associates upon this floor most learned in questions of constitutional law, and from whose matured opinions upon questions of this character I have rarely found myself obliged to dissent; and never, without hesitation and without somewhat of distrust in the soundness or the accuracy of the conclusions to which my own reflections had led me. I take leave, therefore, to state in brief, though it may be but crudely, the views I entertain, as, at the present moment, they may strike my own mind, upon the questions involved in the pending measure.

The bill under consideration is entitled "An act to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States." The bill provides:

That every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

Such is the bill; such are its provisions; plain, concise, yet comprehensive, and of general application. The object and purpose of the bill are sufficiently obvious. It is simply to carry out and to apply an express provision of the Constitution, to wit, in regard to the regulation of commerce among the States, in any and every proper case for its application which may arise. Why not pass the bill? What is the objection to its passage? Why not authorize the railroad companies of the United States to carry passengers and freight, mails and munitions of war from one State to another State? That is the purpose, the chief purpose, for which they were constructed; and for the most part, I suppose, the railroads of the country do now exercise and enjoy this right or privilege. I am not at present advised of but few, of but very few exceptions—the most notable of which is, doubtless, in the State of New Jersey—in which the full exercise and enjoyment of this right or privilege are, in any degree, inhibited or restricted by the State legislation.

That gallant and patriotic State, many years ago, deemed it expedient to confer upon a single company or corporation the privilege of carrying all freight and passengers, for a long term of years, between New York and Philadelphia, to the exclusion of any and of all other railroads across her territory, which then were or which thereafter might be constructed. This is the provision in the charter of the Camden and Amboy Company:

"That it shall not be lawful, at any time during the said railroad charter, [to wit, the Camden and Amboy,] to construct any other railroads in this State without the consent of the said companies, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia; or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative."

This company has now enjoyed the exclusive privilege of the vast amount of transportation of passengers and merchandise, overland, between New York and Philadelphia, for a full third of a century, under a legislative prohibition of all competition from any other line of railroad, then or since constructed, and has claimed and still claims the exclusive benefit of this business under its chartered privilege, so that, when another railroad company—the Raritan and Delaware—under the orders or upon the application of the Federal Government, in 1862, carried a large amount of freight, consisting of troops, horses, arms, and munitions of war, and at cheaper rates and with greater dispatch than the Camden and Amboy Company afforded, as I am informed, over its road, from New York to Philadelphia, it was immediately summoned before the chancellor of New Jersey to render an account of the sum total of the proceeds of this business, with a view to a final decree to pay over this amount to the Camden and Amboy Company, and was perpetually enjoined from carrying passengers and freight thereafter between New York and Philadelphia.

The inquiry recurs, is it competent in a State, or a State Legislature, to grant exclusive privileges of this kind, and to continue them to the prejudice or restriction of commercial intercourse between or "among the several States?" Or, if it be competent to do so, in the absence of congressional action, is it not subject to the exercise of the superior authority of Congress, by virtue of its power, under the Federal Constitution, to "regulate commerce among the several States?" In other words, and for example, is it not competent for Congress, by virtue of this constitutional power, to authorize the Raritan and Delaware, or any other railroad company in New Jersey, to carry passengers and merchandise between New York and Philadelphia, and to receive compensation therefor, notwithstanding the inhibition of the State Legislature? Under this power, derived in terms from the Constitution, I venture to express the opinion that it is competent for Congress to set aside any such special and exclusive legislation, when it at all restricts, impedes, or impairs the facilities of travel and trade and commerce between or among the States; and of the fact itself, Congress, in the exercise of its discretion, must of necessity be the sole judge. In short, I hold it to be entirely competent for Congress to pass this bill, and to place all railroads upon the same footing in respect to the right and privilege of carrying passengers and freight from any one State to another State, notwithstanding any inhibition which may have been imposed by local State enactment. I say inhibition, for the exclusive grant of a privilege to one party is a virtual inhibition to all other parties of the exercise of the same privilege. Congress may, as indeed it has done, declare all railroads to be post routes. It may, as indeed it has done, as in the case of the Illinois Central and other railroads, declare all railroads to be public highways. And with equal authority it may declare all railroads to be lawful structures, and having equal privileges to carry passengers and merchandise "from one State to another State."

This whole question of the extent of the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States" was fully considered by the Supreme Court of the United States, and upon an argument on either side of conceded and consummate ability—by Mr. Webster and Mr. Wirt on the one side, and by Mr. Emmett and Mr. Oakley on the other—some forty years ago, in the famous and familiar case of Gibbons and Ogden, and which has heretofore and often been cited in debate upon this bill. This case grew out of an act of the Legislature of New York granting to Livingston and Fulton the exclusive privilege of navigating by steam vessels, for a term of years, the navigable waters within the jurisdiction of the State. Though this was a case of navigation, yet the court considered the general question of the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States," however carried on, whether by water or by land; whether by navigation or by land conveyance; whether by steamships or by steam cars. The court in that case considered and determined the question of the extent of the power of Congress over the subject of commerce among the States without regard to any particular mode or agency by which it might be conducted. The judgment of the court was in support of the power of Congress over the whole subject of commerce among the States, and against the validity of the State grant.

In this connection I will take leave to read, from the elaborate and masterly opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, who pronounced the judgment of the court, a few paragraphs, as having a direct, and, as I think, a decisive, bearing upon the immediate question before us:

"To what commerce does this power extend? The Constitution informs us, to commerce 'with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.'"

"It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term."

"If this be the admitted meaning of the word, in its application to foreign nations it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence, and remain a unit, unless there be some plain, intelligible cause which alters it."

"The subject to which the power is next applied is to commerce 'among the several States.' The word 'among' means intermingled with. A thing which is among others, is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior."

"It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary."

"Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State. The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself."—9 Wheaton's Reports, 194.

"Commerce among the States must, of necessity, be commerce with the States. In the regulation of trade with the Indian tribes the action of the law, especially when the Constitution was made, was chiefly within a State. The power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States. The sense of the nation on this subject is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods by land between Baltimore and Providence, between New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore."

"We are now arrived at the inquiry, what is this power?"

"It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case, or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single Government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."—Ibid., p. 196.

In this connection I take leave also to read several extracts from the argument of Mr. Webster in this case. Although it is the argument of counsel in behalf of his client, it is nevertheless the argument of a master mind; the argument of a master of the subject; the argument of the great expositor of the Constitution, addressed to the reason and the understanding, upon the points raised of constitutional law and construction:

"In regard to these acts he should contend, in the first place, that they exceeded the power of the Legislature; and, secondly, that if they could be considered valid for any purpose they were void, still, as against any right enjoyed under the laws of the United States with which they came in collision; and that, in this case, they were found interfering with such rights."

"He should contend that the power of Congress to regulate commerce was complete and entire, and, to a certain extent, necessarily exclusive; that the acts in question were regulations of commerce, in a most important particular, and affecting it in those respects in which it was under the exclusive authority of Congress."

"And, as some powers have been held exclusive, and others not so, under the same form of expression, from the nature of the different powers respectively, so, where the power, on any one subject, is given in general words, like the power to regulate commerce, the true method of construction would be to consider of what parts the grant is composed, and which of those, from the nature of the thing, ought to be considered exclusive. The right set up in this case, under the laws of New York, is a monopoly. Now, he thought it very reasonable to say that the Constitution never intended to leave with the States the power of granting monopolies, either of trade or of navigation; and, therefore, that as to this the commercial power was exclusive in Congress."

"Few things were better known than the immediate causes which led to the adoption of the present Constitution; and he thought nothing clearer than the prevailing motive was to regulate commerce; to rescue it from the embarrassing and destructive consequences resulting from the legislation of so many different States, and to place it under the protection of a uniform law."

"By the Confederation divers restrictions had been imposed on the States; but these had not been found sufficient."

"The States could still, each for itself, regulate commerce, and the consequence was a perpetual jarring and hostility of commercial regulations."

"In the history of the times, it was accordingly found that the great topic urged on all occasions, as showing the necessity of a new and different government, was the state of trade and commerce."

"The leading state papers of the times are full of this topic. The New Jersey resolutions complain that the regulations of trade were in the power of the several States, within their separate jurisdiction, in such a degree as to involve many difficulties and embarrassments; and they express an earnest opinion that the sole and exclusive power of regulating trade with foreign States ought to be in Congress. Mr. Witherspoon's motion in Congress, in 1781, is of the same general character; and the report of a committee of that body, in 1785, is still more emphatic. It declares that Congress ought to possess the sole and exclusive power of regulating trade, as well with foreign nations as between the States."

"Over whatever other interests of the country this Government may diffuse its benefits and its blessings, it will always be true, as a matter of historical fact, that it had its immediate origin in the necessities of commerce, and, for its immediate object, the relief of those necessities, by removing their causes and by establishing a uniform and steady system."

"We do not find, in the history of the formation and adoption of the Constitution, that any man speaks of a general concurrent power, in the regulation of foreign and domestic trade, as still residing in the States. The very object intended, more than any other, was to take away such power. If it had not so provided, the Constitution would not have been worth accepting."

"He contended, therefore, that the people intended, in establishing the Constitution, to transfer from the several States to a General Government those high and important powers over commerce which, in their exercise, were to maintain a uniform and general system. From the very nature of the case, these powers must be exclusive; that is, the highest branches of commercial regulation must be exclusively committed to a single hand. What is it that is to be regulated? Not the commerce of the several States, respectively, but the commerce of the United States. Henceforth, the commerce of the States was to be a unit; and the system by which it was to exist and be governed must necessarily be complete, entire, and uniform. Its character was to be described in the flag which waved over it, E pluribus unum."

"Now, how could individual States assert a right of concurrent legislation, in a case of this sort, without manifest encroachment and confusion? It should be repeated, that the words used in the Constitution, 'to regulate commerce,' are so very general and extensive, that they might be construed to cover a vast field of legislation, part of which has always been occupied by State laws; and, therefore, the words must have a reasonable construction, and the power should be considered as exclusively vested in Congress so far, and so far only, as the nature of the power requires. And he insisted that the nature of the case, and of the power, did imperiously require that such important authority as that of granting monopolies of trade and navigation should not be considered as still retained by the States."

"But, although much had been said, in the discussion on former occasions, about this supposed concurrent power in the States, he found great difficulty in understanding what was meant by it. It was generally qualified by saying that it was a power by which the States could pass laws on the subjects of commercial regulation, which would be valid until Congress should pass other laws controlling them, or inconsistent with them, and that then the State laws must yield. What sort of concurrent powers were these which could not exist together? Indeed, the very reading of the clause in the Constitution must put to flight this notion of a general concurrent power. The Constitution was formed for all the States; and Congress was to have power to regulate commerce."

"A road, indeed, might be a matter of general commercial concern. In many cases it is so; and, when it is so, he thought there was no doubt of the power of Congress to make it."

"Now, it must be remembered that this grant is made as an exercise of sovereign political power. It is not an inspection law, nor a health law, nor passed by any derivative authority; it is professedly an act of sovereign power. Of course there is no limit to the power to be derived from the purpose for which it is exercised. If exercised for one purpose it may be also for another."

"If it can grant these exclusive privileges to a few, it may grant them to many; that is, it may grant them to all its own citizens, to the exclusion of everybody else."

"It required little now to be said to prove that this exclusive grant is a law regulating commerce, although in some of the discussions elsewhere it had been called a law of police. If it be not a regulation of commerce, then it follows, against the constant admission on the other side, that Congress, even by an express act, could not annul or control it; for, if it be not a regulation of commerce, Congress has no concern with it. But the granting of monopolies of this kind is always referred to the power over commerce. It was as arbiter of commerce that the king formerly granted such monopolies."

The judgment of the court was in accordance with the views here expressed by Mr. Webster upon the several points which were raised in the discussion of the case, and so far forth sanctions and adopts the argument as the opinion of the court upon these points. This case of Gibbons and Ogden; the argument of the eminent counsel; the final judgment of the court, and the reasoning of the illustrious Chief Justice in pronouncing the opinion of the court, would seem to be conclusive upon the main question now before us.

But it is insisted, with a view, of course, to avoid the force of the decision, that the case of Gibbons and Ogden, being one of navigation, is not analogous to the case we have under consideration; that the question in that case was in reference to the right or authority of a State to grant an exclusive privilege of navigating, by steam vessels, the navigable waters within the jurisdiction of the State, and therefore has no bearing upon the question of the right or authority of a State to grant an exclusive privilege of transporting passengers and freight across its territory, from one State to another State, by land conveyance, or, if you please, by railroad. With all due deference, I think otherwise.

I respectfully submit that the two cases are closely analogous; that the general principle involved is the same in both; that the judicial decision of the one is the rule of law and the rule of action in the other. I have already said that, in considering and deciding upon the question of the application and extent of the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States" the court considered and determined the extent of the power in its application to the regulation of commerce among the States without reference to the mere mode and manner of its transportation, whether by land or by water. It was even made a question in the Ogden case whether the term or phrase in the Constitution, "commerce among the several States," comprehended navigation. It was not made a question whether it comprehended conveyance or transportation by land.

In respect to the power of Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States," that power is neither enlarged nor abridged by any mere mode or manner by which it is carried on. Will any one contend that the power of Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States" is limited to that commerce alone which is carried on upon the navigable waters within the jurisdiction of the several States; and that it has no relation to, and nothing to do with, and does not reach that far more extended and diversified commerce which is carried on among the several States by land? Is not the exercise of the power quite as important to the regulation of commerce by land—by railroad, if you please—as by navigation?

It is true, nothing was said in the consideration and discussion of that case about railroads as a means of commercial intercourse among the States. In fact, railroads at that time were unknown in the country.

But now the whole surface of the country is interwoven and overspread as by a grand network of railroads, connected together, running through and uniting the several States, far and near, in more intimate commercial, as well as social and political, relations, than ever before, and forming one great national railway system. If I may be allowed the simile, our railroads now constitute the great national arteries of the Republic, through which runs the life-blood of the body-politic; and anything which obstructs or impairs its full and free circulation at any one point affects and disorders the whole system. I doubt not that to-day more than one half—perhaps three fourths, possibly seven eighths—of the domestic commerce of the country among the several States is carried on by means of our railroads over the territories of the several States, and among the several States, and from one State to another State. I repeat the question, then, is not the exercise of the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States" quite as important to the regulation of commerce by railroad transportation as by river or coastwise navigation? And is it not quite as important that the one should be free and exempt from State restrictions as the other? Why shall the power be applied in the one case and not in the other? Why this distinction? There is no reason for it—none whatever. The public roads and highways of a State are open and common to the use of all the citizens of the United States, as are its navigable streams; and it is but sheer inconsistency to assert that Congress may regulate the commerce over the one and not over the other.

The power of Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States" necessarily reaches it anywhere and everywhere among the States—not less upon the railroad car than upon the steamboat. The main purpose of conferring this power upon Congress was to secure a uniform system of commercial regulations, emanating from a single authority, instead of being subject to various and conflicting rules and regulations which must unavoidably follow if each State were to prescribe its own rules and regulations. It was for the very purpose of securing this unity, this harmony, of action that the States consented to yield this power to the Federal Government; and among the foremost and most persistent of all the States in favor of surrendering this power in the several States to the Federal authority for the purpose of securing unity and uniformity in the regulations of commerce was New Jersey herself, be it said to her high credit.

What, then, is the measure or extent of this power—this power to "regulate commerce among the several States?" The obvious answer is, that it is as full and complete as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Manifestly, it is as full and complete as is the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. Most clearly it is as full and complete as the several States themselves possessed before the formation of the Constitution. In other words, it is the same power which the respective States themselves possessed when under the Confederation. In short, the States severally surrendered to the Federal Government, and consequently divested themselves of whatever power they possessed over the subject.

The power of Congress, therefore, to "regulate commerce among the several States" is plenary, it is exclusive, it is coextensive with the subject upon which it operates, and, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, "it operates upon that subject wherever it exists." And what is this power to regulate? to "regulate commerce among the several States?" Manifestly it is something more than a mere power to issue registers to merchant and trading vessels, or to grant licenses, or to give permits, or to establish ports of entry. From its very nature and purpose, it is a power to create, or rather to preserve and to protect, and not to destroy. It is a power to improve, and not to impair. It is a power to facilitate, and not to retard or to embarrass; and more than all, and essential to all, and comprehending all these, it is a power to interpose and to remove whatever obstructions or restrictions may have been imposed upon commercial intercourse with and between the several States by local State legislation, taking care always to distinguish between that legislation and that commerce which are strictly local and internal, and which affect only the citizens of the particular State, and that legislation and that commerce which are more general, and which affect the citizens of other States. To illustrate: Congress may interpose and annul the restrictions of a grant from the State of New York for the exclusive navigation of the Hudson river. Congress may not interpose and annul the restrictions of a like grant for the navigation of Cayuga lake; the reason being that in the one case it is strictly local and internal, and affects only the interests of citizens of the particular State, while in the other case the exclusive grant affects the commercial rights and interests of citizens of other States. For the same reason, Congress may not interfere with the local municipal railroads in the city of New York, or Brooklyn, or Buffalo, while it may interfere to remove the restrictions of an exclusive grant to any one of the great railroad lines across the State, to the exclusion of all her other lines of road, in the conveying of passengers and freight from one State to another State, by authorizing the other railroad companies to exercise and enjoy the same privilege. This distinction is recognized in all our courts. This distinction is reasserted and reaffirmed in the argument of counsel and in the opinion of the court in the case of Ogden.

But the inquiry is made, what is commerce? And by way of criticism or of sarcasm, rather than of answer to the inquiry, it is said that a railroad is not commerce—the railroad cars are not commerce which Congress may regulate. True, railroad cars nor the track upon which they run are commerce, nor is a ship commerce, nor the river or the bay upon which it floats; but they are all agencies of commerce. It is said that passengers are not commerce, that freight is not commerce. All true enough. Nor are cotton, or wool, or wheat, or corn, or sugar, or coffee, or salt, or silks, or hardware, of themselves commerce. But they are all elements of commerce. And when the cotton, or wool, or wheat, or corn, are placed upon the train of cars and transported from one part of the country—from the great West for example—to another part of the country, say to Boston, or New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and there exchanged for other commodities—sugar, tea, coffee, and other articles of merchandise—and these, in turn, are placed upon the railroad train, and carried back for distribution and consumption among the people, this process—the combined operation of all these elements and agencies—constitutes or produces that result, that idea, which we denominate commerce. It is commerce; it is domestic commerce; it is commerce among the several States; it is commerce in which the citizens of more than one State are interested—in which the citizens of the whole country are interested; it is commerce in the sense and meaning of the Constitution. And this is commerce, which Congress has power to "regulate" in its transit over intervening States to other States, and to remove any obstructions which may be imposed upon its transportation by local State legislation. Commerce, though a complex idea, is nevertheless a unit, a one integral interest, and not several and separate. It is an interest; an important interest; a vital interest; general, pervading, and common to the whole country. It is an interest which belongs, not to the States severally, but to the States united; as much so as your Army and Navy. It is therefore a national and not a local interest; an interest to be regulated by national and not by local authority.

Again, Mr. President, it is said, as though the assertion was pertinent to the present inquiry, that a State—New Jersey, for instance—is under no obligation to build a railroad at all; and the question is asked, can we compel her to build a railroad or any other kind of road across her territory? No, sir; I do not contend that we can compel a State to build a road of any kind, otherwise than by what may be called moral compulsion. Nor do I contend that a State is under obligation to build a road of any description across her territory other than the obligation which every State owes to itself as a member of the Union; other than the obligation which every State owes to the community at large; other than the obligation which every State owes to the advancing civilization of the age, to keep step with the progress of the improvements of the times; and it is hardly to be conceived that any stronger or more cogent incentive, in addition to the motive of self-interest, can be presented or urged upon the consideration of a State as an inducement to the fulfillment of a high public duty. But suppose, what is hardly a supposable case, that a State—New Jersey, for illustration—blindly and obstinately refuses or neglects to fulfill this high duty to itself and to the country, and constructs no road, and will not construct any road, and will open no way, nor provide any means of intercommunication over her territory with other States. What then? Is there no relief? Is there no remedy? Must we submit to be forever barred from all intercourse between other and contiguous States across her territory?

Is there no way of opening communication over her territory between New York and Philadelphia? Is your Federal Government so feeble and so powerless that it cannot open a way of communication over the territory of an intervening State so delinquent in this regard? No, sir, your Federal Government has ample power to provide the full measure of relief in such a case; and under its unquestioned authority to establish post roads, or military roads, or commercial roads, if you please, it may construct one or more roads across the territory of the delinquent State, as the public necessities or the public convenience may require.

If the State, however, shall build one road and but one road over its territory, so long as that road shall meet the full measure of the public demand and furnish the requisite and adequate facilities for commercial intercourse between the several States, so far forth that State fulfills its obligation to itself and to the public in that behalf; but the one road failing to meet the public wants, and to furnish adequate means of commercial intercourse with and between other States, it presents the occasion for the Federal Government to exert its power and to construct another road across the intervening State, in order to meet the public wants. But if the State itself shall build two or more roads over its territory, connecting with adjacent States, and especially if the State itself shall inhibit the use of either or any one of these roads to all passengers and freight from one State to another, Congress may establish either or all of them as post roads, or as military roads; or, if the interests of commerce shall require it, Congress may declare them to be lawful structures for the carrying on of trade and commerce among the several States, any inhibition or restriction of the State Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the more recent case of the Wheeling bridge the general doctrine for which we are contending was recognized and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The bridge over the Ohio river at Wheeling, Virginia, was complained of by Pennsylvania as an obstruction to the navigation of the river. This complaint was brought before the court, which, upon full hearing and examination, adjudged the bridge an obstruction to the navigation of the river, and issued an order upon the bridge company to abate the nuisance by elevating the bridge or removing it altogether. The action of Congress was subsequently invoked upon this subject, and Congress, by virtue of its power "to regulate commerce among the several States," and to establish post roads, passed an act declaring the bridge to be a lawful structure and post road, "anything in any law or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding." The Supreme Court of the United States sustained this action of Congress, and dismissed an application for process against the bridge company to compel it to comply with the previous order of the court to elevate or remove the bridge.

The court in this case fully recognized the power of Congress to interpose in this, and in all like cases, when the general interests of commerce are impaired or restricted by local State legislation; and while the court concedes the right of State sovereignty, within its own limits, and by its own acts of legislation, to impose such restrictions as it may deem proper upon its own citizens, in the use of its own territory, it also holds all such legislation subject and subordinate to the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States," and that when Congress exercises that power the State laws must give way. Congress, in the exercise of its paramount power in this case, declared the bridge a lawful structure, though admitted to be an obstruction, more or less, to the navigation of the river; a river, too, which by compact between Virginia and Kentucky, and with the assent of Congress, at the time of the admission of Kentucky into the Union, was to be forever open to commerce to the use of all the citizens of the United States. Congress, in the exercise of its discretion, declared the bridge a lawful structure, on the ground that the general interests of commerce would suffer more from the removal and want of the bridge than from its obstruction to the navigation of the river. Hence Congress declared that the bridge should be continued—for that was the effect of the act—for the reason that the greater interests of commerce required its continuance, notwithstanding its admitted degree of obstruction to the navigation of the river.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member will permit me to suggest that I think he mistakes the decision in that case; and I rise merely for the purpose of correcting what I suppose to be the error into which he has fallen.

Mr. FOOT. I shall be very happy to be corrected if I am wrong. I am very liable, perhaps, to fall into error on such points.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not so much as I am. However, I am not so liable in this instance, as I argued the case to which the honorable member refers. The bridge was built under a law of Virginia incorporating a company for the purpose of building it. The law provided that it should be so built as not to interfere with the navigation of the Ohio river. After it was built, after it had been a structure for some time, there were some five or six vessels built at Pittsburgh, for the purpose of trading between Pittsburgh and points lower down the river, with chimneys so elevated that at certain stages of the water it was impossible for them to pass the bridge, or, at any rate, to pass the bridge without hazard of injury. The Supreme Court, by a majority, decided that the court had jurisdiction to ascertain whether the bridge itself was an obstruction to the navigation of the river without any particular legislation on the part of Congress. The minority of the court, consisting of three, I think, held that before the courts of the United States could possess jurisdiction there ought to be legislation upon the part of Congress, giving the courts authority in a case of that description.

The court therefore decided that the bridge was either to come down, or to be elevated to such a height as the court itself prescribed, or if the obstruction could be practically removed by a draw in the bridge over the "western branch," which when the water was high afforded easy navigation, and therefore should not make it necessary for the vessels to pass under the bridge, that such a draw should be constructed. Then Congress passed the act to which my friend now refers declaring the bridge to be a post route, and deciding that it was of a sufficient height. The majority of the court held that Congress, under the authority to regulate commerce between the States, as the bridge, in the absence of legislation, interfered with the freedom of commerce, interfered with the navigation of the river, (which they considered as included within the power to regulate commerce,) had a right to prescribe for itself what should not be an impediment to navigation. But if the honorable member will look at that decision as given by Mr. Justice Nelson, I think he will find that they disavowed expressly the authority of Congress to bridge at all. They considered a road as between the States as intrusted entirely to the jurisdiction of the States. All that they maintained was that if the States in the exercise of that jurisdiction construct a bridge which interferes with the navigation of a navigable river, then Congress can interfere, either by deciding that it is not to be considered in the particular instance an interference with the navigation, or by authorizing the courts to abate it.

Mr. FOOT. I presume the honorable Senator is correct in his statement of the case, and I say here that I shall take an early occasion to renew my reading of that case, and if I find myself in error in any particular of my argument I shall very cheerfully make the modification. But enough on that point.

Mr. President, this bill, in a former debate, has been assailed and denounced as an infringement, a contemplated assault, upon the rights of sovereign States, and of New Jersey in particular. Nothing of this kind, in purpose or in effect, belongs to the bill. So far from encroaching upon the rights of a sovereign State, it is a proposition to intervene in behalf of, and for the protection of, the sovereign rights of all the citizens of all the States from infringement or restriction by any single State. It is strictly an alleviative and not an aggressive measure. It is only the exercise of a power which the States themselves voluntarily and unanimously vested in the Federal Government, and for the very purpose of protecting the people of other States from the imposition of commercial restrictions, and from commercial blockade, if you please, by the action of any one of the States.

New Jersey has no cause of complaint at the exercise of this power on the part of Congress. She was not only the first of the States of the old Confederation to urge the surrender of this power in the States to the Federal Government, but in her charter to the Camden and Amboy Company this power in the Federal Congress is recognized by both parties—the State and the corporation. By the original charter, in consideration of the exclusive privilege of carrying all passengers and freight between New York and Philadelphia, it was provided that the company should pay to the State ten cents per capita on all passengers, and fifteen cents per ton on all freight and merchandise transported over the road between those two points. Call it a bonus for the privilege, or a tax upon the franchise—call it what you please; it is, in effect, a levy of tribute upon the people—upon all passengers and freight—from without the State to that extent. By a supplemental act in 1854, this fixed percentage on freight and passengers was commuted by the transfer to the State of an agreed number of shares of the capital stock of the company. The sixth section of the supplemental act contains this condition:

"That when any other railroad or roads for the transportation of passengers and property between New York and Philadelphia, across this State, shall be constructed and used for that purpose, under or by virtue of any law of this State or the United States authorizing or recognizing said road, that then, and in that case, the said dividends shall no longer be payable to the State, and the said stock shall be retransferred to the company by the treasurer of this State."

Here is an express recognition of the authority of the Federal Government, and of the probable exercise of that authority, to build another railroad between New York and Philadelphia; or to authorize any other railroad which might be constructed under the authority of that State to carry passengers and freight between those cities—just what this bill authorizes, and nothing more.

New Jersey, it has been well remarked, occupies a peculiar and most important geographical position in reference to this question of commercial intercourse among the States, situated as it is directly and for the whole distance between the two largest commercial cities and most populous cities on the American continent; located, as it were, directly across the great pathway of travel and trade and commerce between the North and the South on the Atlantic side, and over whose territory there annually pass probably more travel and trade than over any other equal extent of space in the whole country.

The citizens of New York and Philadelphia, of Boston and of Baltimore; of the States of New England and New York; of Pennsylvania and Maryland; and of the States of the West, too, are most deeply and directly interested in having whatever existing means of transit for trade and travel across the territory of New Jersey there may be unrestricted by any prohibition of their use, or what is the same thing, by any exclusive grant to one line of communication over another. Let all the public avenues of trade and commerce be open and common to all the people of the country. This is their right, their constitutional right—their right of transit over the highways or the railways, no less than over the rivers and the navigable waters of any State, paying a reasonable compensation therefor. Both are alike open and common to all the citizens of the United States under that provision of the Constitution which declares that the "citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." I repeat it, Mr. President, it is not within the province of any State, it is not within the prerogative of any State, either directly or indirectly, either by positive prohibition to one road or by special privilege to another, to inhibit or restrict the right of transit of citizens of other States, or their merchandise, over any one of its roads over which they may choose to pass, any more than it can inhibit their right of transit over any one of its navigable rivers, or any more than it can inhibit their right to purchase and hold real estate within its territory.

These are all rights common to all the citizens of the United States, common to all the citizens of a common country, common to all the citizens of our common Government. Nor may a State any more inhibit the use of all but one of several roads over its territory to the citizens of other States than it may prohibit altogether and absolutely the use of any and of all its public roads for travel and trade, especially so, if the general interests of commerce are at all impeded or impaired by such limitation. And it is no answer to say that because a State has built one or more roads over its territory, and thereby provided better facilities of commercial intercourse with other States than if it had built no roads at all, that therefore it may interdict the use of all other roads which are or which may be built across its territory by citizens from without the State. The right of transit over any of the public roads and highways of any State belongs to every citizen of the Republic.

Mr. President, without pursuing this discussion further at present, I will say, in conclusion, that in my humble judgment Congress has the constitutional right to pass this bill; that it has the constitutional right to remove these local legislative restrictions upon trade and commerce between or among the States; that it has, to this end, the constitutional right to authorize any or all the railroads of the country, so far as in its judgment it will facilitate commercial intercourse, to carry passengers and freight from any one State to another State. This is the whole proposition of the bill. If it passes, its constitutionality can readily be tested before another tribunal whose decision will be final upon the question. If it proves to be a valid act it will stand; if otherwise, it will fall, alike useless and harmless.

As to the expediency of passing this bill, assuming that we have the constitutional right to pass it, and to remove these local restrictions upon trade and commerce, it is enough to say that its passage is demanded by high considerations of public interest, and no less of public faith.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate postpone the present and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUFFRAGE.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia. When the bill was last under consideration it was recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and on Friday last was reported back by the committee, with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That, from and after the passage of this act, each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and who is a citizen of the United States, and who shall have resided in the said District for the period of six months previous to any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person whose duty it shall be to receive votes at any election within the District of Columbia who shall willfully refuse to receive or who shall willfully reject the vote of any person entitled to such right under this act, shall be liable to an action of tort by the person injured, and shall be liable on indictment and conviction, if such act was done knowingly, to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year in the jail of said District, or to both.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not to exceed $1,000, or be imprisoned in the jail in said District for a period not to exceed thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the several courts having criminal jurisdiction in said District to give this act in special charge to the grand jury at the commencement of each term of the court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the mayors and aldermen of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, on or before the 1st day of March in each year, shall prepare a list of the persons they judge to be qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said mayors and aldermen shall be in open session to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said list, on two days in each year, not exceeding five days prior to the annual election for the choice of city officers, giving previous notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper printed in said District.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That on or before the day of —, the mayors and aldermen of said cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, respectively, at least ten days prior to said annual election.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officers presiding at any election shall keep and use the check-list herein required at the polls during the election of all officers, and no vote shall be received unless delivered by the voter in person, and not until the presiding officer has had opportunity to be satisfied of his identity, and shall find his name on the list, and mark it, and ascertain that his vote is single.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to debate the bill and the amendment, and I ask the Senate to postpone it until one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate will remember that at its last session on Friday the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau was under consideration, was called up and read, and several amendments to it adopted, and at the instance of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] it was passed over until to-day. This morning the Senator from Vermont desired to deliver his views upon another bill which has run now to the middle of the afternoon, and has occupied the time up to the present moment; and now it is proposed to take up another bill with a view to have it postponed and discussed to-morrow. I cannot consent to have the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which is one of pressing importance and which ought to be acted upon at an early day, thrust aside in this way, and therefore I cannot consent to this bill going over until to-morrow with any expectation that it is to come up to-morrow. I shall insist upon taking up the other bill. It will be for the Senate to determine which bill shall be taken up. So far as I am concerned, I shall urge upon the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Freedmen's Bureau bill to-morrow and continue it until we finally dispose of it. I hope I shall have the support of the Senate in doing this, and I think that this bill ought not to be thrust in after the consideration of the other one has been commenced.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like very much to say what I have to say on the subject of the bill that is now before the Senate to-morrow. After I have delivered what it is my purpose to say upon it, I shall be very indifferent about any immediate action at that time upon the bill. I shall then be willing for the bill to which the honorable Senator from Illinois refers, or any other bill whatever, to immediately supersede the bill that is now before the Senate. All that I ask—and there are peculiar reasons why I ask it—is, that I shall have an opportunity of speaking my sentiments upon the bill that is now before the Senate to-morrow. When I get through, the pleasure of the Senate, or of the honorable Senator from Illinois, or any other gentleman, can be adopted by the Senate; I care not. But I ask him, in courtesy to myself, to give me an opportunity of saying what I desire to say upon the subject of this bill to-morrow, and then any course that he may suggest will receive my consent and acquiescence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I certainly dislike to interpose any objection after what the Senator from Kentucky has said, that he desires to express his views on this subject and asks as a matter of courtesy that he may have an opportunity to do so to-morrow; but this is taking me very much by surprise, and, I think, is interfering with the public business of the country. We have a bill pending before us which is thought by the head of the Freedmen's Bureau and by many members of the Senate to be a matter of practical importance. We have accounts every day from the South of the wrongs inflicted upon the colored race, and of the injustice that is being done them, and we have established a Freedmen's Bureau for the purpose of taking charge of them. A bill is introduced here conferring additional powers upon that bureau, which, if it is enforced, will protect them in all their civil rights, and there is an importance in having early action upon it. The Senate has commenced its consideration.

It has been laid aside to-day in order to allow one member of the Senate to express his views upon a bill in regard to commercial intercourse between the different States, and now we are asked to postpone it again in order to bring up the District bill. It is not by reason of any opposition either to the bill upon which the Senator from Vermont spoke, or the bill which the Senator from Maine has in charge, that I urge action upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill, but it is because I think it a bill of practical importance which the Senate ought to act upon at an early day. I see no haste about the other bill. I am not aware that any election is pending immediately that it is to effect, and it will doubtless lead to a protracted discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that any motion was made to postpone. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Illinois. I called this bill up because it had once been before the Senate, and I supposed was in a condition to be proceeded with. I was not aware that any other measure was before the Senate, nor am I now; and I desire to repel the inference which seems to follow from the remark of the honorable Senator, that this measure is thrust in here at the expense of public business. I do not know by what authority this is said to be private business, or this is to be subjected to the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I have supposed that the bill now before the Senate was of a public character, and of an important character, and that it was perfectly proper for me at any time to bring it before the Senate when there was nothing else before it; and I do not like to be complained of when, in the discharge of an ordinary duty, I bring a measure before the Senate. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, I would not antagonize it for a moment against the bill referred to by the honorable Senator. I had no notice that he designed to take up that bill to-day or to-morrow. I knew the bill was up on Friday, and I knew perfectly well that no time was assigned for its consideration, leaving the whole question of its consideration open. So far as its having precedence of this bill is concerned, the honorable Senator would have remarked, if he had been observant, that this bill was once before the Senate on the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and recommitted, and immediately reported back again, and so was in a condition to be proceeded with. I am not going to urge this bill now. I am disposed, so far as I am concerned, to accommodate the Senator from Kentucky. If it is the sense of the Senate, however, that the other bill had better be proceeded with, I shall acquiesce without opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I made a motion to postpone this subject until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to inquire whether the Senator from Kentucky cannot as well make his remarks on the bill of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I made the inquiry for the sake of convenience; it seemed to me to be quite possible that the Senator might make his remarks on that bill; and I was going to observe that it did seem to me that, all things considered, perhaps it would be advisable for the Senate to proceed first with the Freedmen's Bureau bill; and then, I should say, the other bill which the Senator from Illinois has in charge. Both of those bills are kindred in their character, and they do not open the question which is involved in the District bill. The District bill opens the great question of suffrage. I would, therefore, suggest that the Senator from Illinois should proceed with his bill to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better settle the matter to-day, and not have a controversy to-morrow about the bills which we shall consider. The Senator from Kentucky desires to express his views upon the bill which the Senator from Maine has in charge, on personal considerations; he asks it as a matter of courtesy to him. I do not very well see how to resist that; and if the Senator from Maine will consent that after the Senator from Kentucky shall have made his remarks that bill may be laid aside and the one to which I have called attention proceeded with, I shall agree, so far as I am concerned, that that bill may come up to-morrow. What I was apprehensive of was that if the District bill came up to-morrow, and the Senator from Kentucky spoke upon it, a lengthy discussion would be the result, that would for a long period prevent any action upon the other bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that course being taken, yielding to what I suppose to be the sense of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I shall interpose no objection to the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that this bill be postponed until to-morrow, with the understanding that on the conclusion of his remarks the Freedmen's Bureau bill shall be taken up.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS was agreed to.

IOWA SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' HOME.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to take up the joint resolution which was reported this morning by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) granting certain public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, of Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to donate to that institution the buildings, sheds, furniture, and other property at Camp Kinsman, near Davenport, Iowa.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Iowa what is the supposed value of the buildings?

Mr. GRIMES. I have not seen the buildings, and can only state to the Senate what I am told by others. Perhaps the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, and who have had a conference with the Secretary of War on the subject, can furnish that information more authentically than I can. Their value is not great, however. The property consists of the sheds and barracks connected with a camp which has been occupied for some months by some three hundred orphan children of soldiers, made orphans by the war; it is in their possession already. I suppose its value does not exceed $1,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator does not understand me as objecting to the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; I did not so understand you.

Mr. JOHNSON. I merely wanted to know the supposed value of the property. There are in Maryland, at Point Lookout, buildings of the same character erected during the war for the Government, costing, I understand, some four or five hundred thousand dollars, but which I suppose would not sell now for more than eight or nine thousand dollars, and I believe there has been a bill passed the House—I am not sure about that, though—giving the whole of those buildings to the proprietors of the land in liquidation of the claim which they say they have for the rent of their property. I thought it possible that this might establish a precedent beyond bills of that description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there a claim for the rent of the land in this case?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. No, sir. When this resolution was up before, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to look into the matter and see if some general law could not be passed embracing the public property in the different States that was claimed for the use of charitable associations. This joint resolution was submitted to the Secretary of War, and by him referred to General Meigs, the Quartermaster General. They report, substantially, without reading the letters or referring to them, that in this case they think it would be proper to give this property over to this orphan asylum, but that no general law can be passed on the subject without danger of interfering with the public interests. Here was a temporary camp at Davenport, a temporary rendezvous for soldiers from Iowa and Illinois, perhaps, consisting of temporary sheds and barracks. By the consent of the War Department they were set apart for the use of the Orphans' Home of Iowa, and have been so occupied. The Secretary of War thinks it will be proper to give this property to that association. There is no claim on the property for fee-simple or anything else.

Mr. JOHNSON. No claim for rent?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. No, sir; nothing of the kind.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senate, by unanimous consent, to proceed now to consider Senate bill No. 54, which was reported this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 54) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes so to amend the act of March 3, 1865, as to make it read as follows:

That Ulysses S. Grant, David G. Farragut, Hannibal Hamlin, Andrew Johnson, Salmon P. Chase, Edwin M. Stanton, Gideon Welles, John A. Dix, George Bancroft, William T. Sherman, John A. Andrew, Andrew G. Curtin, Oliver P. Morton, Benjamin F. Butler, George G. Meade, Nathaniel P. Banks, Joseph Hooker, Samuel R. Curtis, Richard J. Oglesby, David Todd, Henry Ward Beecher, Ambrose E. Burnside, John A. Logan, Daniel S. Dickinson, William A. Buckingham, Carl Schurz, Oliver O. Howard, Hamilton Fish, Frank Sigel, Austin Blair, Thomas C. Fletcher, Robert J. Breckinridge, Lovell H. Rousseau, Horace Greely, George H. Stuart, Joseph Henry, John G. Barnard, Henry J. Raymond, William B. Astor, James Gordon Bennett, H. W. Halleck, William E. Dodge, William M. Evarts, James T. Brady, Gerritt Smith, Reuben E. Fenton, Bellamy Storer, George P. McIlvaine, Galusha A. Grow, Henry W. Bellows, J. S. C. Abbott, Jay Cooke, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Israel Washburn, Jr., Ichabod Goodwin, Frederick Smyth, John Z. Goodrich, Charles Henry Davis, William Chadin, J. Wiley Edmunds, Amos A. Lawrence, Edward S. Tobey, Thomas Russell, Charles G. Loring, George B. Upton, Charles G. Greene, J. M. S. Williams, George G. Stannard, Henry M. Rice, Grenville M. Dodge, Morton McMichael, Thomas Webster, James M. Scofield, Nathaniel B. Baker, Richard J. Field, Henry C. Carey, John W. Forney, Bishop M. Simpson, G. S. Griffith, William Henry Channing, James E. Yeatman, Dwight Durkee, A. T. Stewart, Barnabas Hobbs, Montgomery Blair, Joseph K. Barnes, T. B. Ward, Henry W. Beauhan, Frank Moore, Alfred Lee, Edward Solomon, Thomas C. Bryon, B. B. French, Samuel J. Crawford, James T. Pratt, Alfred H. Terry, Edward Tompkins, Moses E. Odell, and their successors, duly chosen, are hereby constituted and created a body corporate in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation hereby constituted shall consist of one hundred members, and any number of corporations greater than one fifth of the whole number shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and any business that may have been done, or may hereafter be done, by such a quorum, shall be deemed valid and of the same legal effect as if the same had been embodied in the original act. They shall have power to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations: Provided, That such by-laws, rules, and regulations are not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the business of said corporation shall be managed by a board of twelve directors, who shall elect from their number a president, two vice presidents, and a secretary; and seven of the directors, of whom the president or one of the vice presidents shall be one, shall form a quorum for the transaction of business at any meeting of the board of directors.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall have authority to procure for early use, at suitable places, sites for military asylums for all persons serving in the war of the rebellion not provided for by existing laws, who have been or may hereafter be disqualified for procuring their own maintenance and support by reason of wounds received or sickness contracted while in the line of their duty during the present rebellion; and to have the necessary buildings erected, having due regard to the health of the location, facility of access, and competency to accommodate the persons provided for in this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That for the establishment and support of this asylum there shall be appropriated all stoppages or fines adjudged against such officers and soldiers, or seamen, by sentence of courts-martial, or military commission, over and above the amounts necessary for the reimbursement of the Government or of individuals; all forfeitures on account of desertion from such service; and all moneys due such deceased officers and soldiers, or seamen, which now are or may be unclaimed for three years after the death of such officers, soldiers, or seamen, to be repaid upon the demand of the heirs or legal representatives of such deceased officers, soldiers, or seamen. And the said directors are hereby authorized to receive all donations of money or property made by any person or persons for the benefit of the asylum, and to hold or dispose of the same for its sole and exclusive use.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the selection of the sites for the said asylums, and the plan of the buildings, and the rules and regulations for the general and internal direction of the asylum, shall be made by the directors, and they may do all other acts necessary for the government and interests of the same, as hereby authorized.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the asylums shall consist of a governor, a deputy governor, a secretary, and a treasurer, and such other officers as the board of directors may deem necessary; to be appointed from disabled officers serving as before mentioned, and they may be appointed and removed from time to time, as the interests of the institution may require, by the board of directors.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of the asylum, and may be admitted thereto upon the recommendation of three of the board of directors, namely, all officers, soldiers, and seamen who have served in the present war and not provided for by existing laws, who have been or who may be disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted in the line of their duty; and such of these as have neither wife, child, or parent dependent upon them, on becoming inmates of this asylum, or receiving relief therefrom, shall assign thereto their pensions, when required by the board of directors, during the time they shall remain therein or receive its benefits.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall make an annual report of the condition of the asylum to the War Department, which shall be communicated to Congress on the first Monday of every January after the passage of this act, and it shall be the duty of the said directors to examine and audit the accounts of the treasurer, and visit the asylums quarterly.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all inmates of the asylum shall be, and they are hereby, made subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and will be governed thereby in the same manner as if they were in the Army or Navy of the United States.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the directors of the asylum shall have power and authority to aid persons who are entitled to its benefits by out-door relief in such manner and to such extent as they may deem proper, provided such relief shall not exceed the average cost of maintaining an inmate of the asylum.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. GRIMES. With the assent of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I move to amend the fifth section by striking out the words "or seamen" wherever they occur; they are to be found in the fourth, eighth, tenth, and twelfth lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. In section eight, line five, I move to strike out the words "and seamen," and before "soldiers," in line four, to insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out the words "or Navy" in line four of section ten.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the Senator from Iowa desires to make a further amendment to the bill, so as to insure the exclusion from its operation of seamen in the naval service; and to give him an opportunity to prepare his amendment, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. Moore, his Secretary.

On motion by Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 15, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock M. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

Committees were called for reports to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider; but no such reports were presented.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Maine.

TAX UPON HULLS OF VESSELS.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the two per cent. tax upon the hulls of vessels as launched.

CONDITION OF THE PRESIDENT'S HOUSE.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and inquire into the condition of the Presidential Mansion as regards health, and whether it is suitable, as to locality, size, and convenience, for the residence of the President and family, and if not, whether grounds of proper extent, in a proper locality, can be procured upon which to erect a suitable mansion; and that they report such estimates and recommendations touching the subject hereby referred to them as they may see fit.

MILITARY AND NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE introduced a joint resolution granting certain public property to the National Military and Naval Asylum; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. DELANO. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of Hon. William Byers, Hon. G. H. Kyle, and Hon. James M. Johnson, claiming seats in the Houses of Representatives from the State of Arkansas, accompanied by a memorial; and I ask their reference to the committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to; and the papers were ordered to be printed.

Mr. DELANO. I ask for the reading of the memorial.

The SPEAKER. That would be in the nature of debate, and is not in order.

INSURANCE AGENTS.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the internal revenue laws that insurance agents, the net proceeds of whose business does not exceed twenty-five dollars per annum, shall not be required to take licenses.

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. ALLEY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring all fire and marine insurance companies to invest in Government securities and deposit a certain per cent. of their capital and receipts in the Treasury of the United States for the better security of the insured, and that they be allowed to insure in any part of the United States under such rules and regulations as Congress shall prescribe.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF CONNECTICUT.

Mr. DEMING submitted resolutions of the General Assembly of Connecticut, relating to the present condition of public affairs, adopted at its recent session in 1865; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JOHN HARDING.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, introduced a bill for the relief of William John Harding; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EXPEDITION TO CHILI.

Mr. LAFLIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the publication of the remaining volume of the Naval and Astronomical Expedition to Chili, and that, until the committee report, the publication thereof be suspended.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask if thus stopping the publication of this document until the House committee reports may not postpone the publication indefinitely. Is there not danger of that?

Mr. LAFLIN. I answer that this refers to a publication which was ordered some twelve years since, and which has been suspended for the last five or six years. The Superintendent of the Astronomical Observatory is now ready to present his report, and has notified the Superintendent of Public Printing that the manuscript is ready for the press. But inasmuch as there is some question as to what Department this printing belongs, and as there is also some question as to the propriety of publishing this fourth volume, it has been thought proper, at a meeting of the joint committee, that this resolution should be presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. If there is any further debate it must go over.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no objection, if it has been a subject of consideration by the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. GOODYEAR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that any national bank now in existence be allowed, under such restrictions and regulations as may be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, to change its place of business from its present location into any other State or Territory in the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That an amendment to the Constitution of the United States be submitted to the States for their ratification in one of the two following forms:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of citizens of the United States: Provided, That whenever, in any State, civil or political rights or privileges shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of citizens of the United States: Provided, That whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to refer the resolution to the committee on reconstruction; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was ordered to be printed.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. DARLING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the naturalization laws so as to provide that all persons, before taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, shall be required to read intelligently said Constitution; and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DARLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENESEE RIVER.

Mr. HART submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction and completion of piers at the mouth of the Genesee river on Lake Ontario.

DUTY ON FOREIGN UMBRELLAS.

Mr. THAYER submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the yeas and nays:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether an increased duty should not be laid upon foreign umbrellas and parasols imported into this country, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

BOUNTY TO REGULARS.

Mr. STROUSE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of including non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the regular Army, who were in the service at the breaking out of, and during a part or the whole of, the rebellion, in any bounties that may be paid to the volunteers who enlisted in 1861 and 1862.

WHITE SUFFRAGE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BROOMALL submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas all just government derives its powers from the consent of the governed; and whereas, the best mode of obtaining that consent is by means of the ballot-box; and whereas the white men of the District of Columbia have recently decided by that means that, in their opinion, the black man should not be allowed the right of suffrage; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ordering an election, at which the black men of the District shall decide by ballot whether or not, in their opinion, the white men should be allowed the right of suffrage.

[Great laughter.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to inquire if my colleague if that resolution would not prevent members of Congress from voting in this House in the District of Columbia. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I think not.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 12, not voting 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—138.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Broomall, Grinnell, Hale, Henderson, Higby, Kelo, Longyear, Starr, Stevens, and Williams—12.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Barker, Blaine, Blow, Culver, Dawson, Dumont, Garfield, Harris, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jones, Loan, McClurg, McIndoe, Moulton, Myers, Nowell, Niblack, Rousseau, Sloan, Burt Van Horn, Robert F. Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, and Wright—32.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANCONA submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be, and they are hereby, directed to bring in a bill at an early day fixing the rate of mileage, so as to equalize the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. ANCONA asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and also demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was upon laying the resolution upon the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] to modify his resolution, so as to make it one of inquiry, and not mandatory upon the committee.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would have no objection to a resolution of inquiry, but I am opposed to this resolution in its present form.

Mr. ANCONA. I would prefer not to modify the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not usual to instruct a committee peremptorily in relation to such matters.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not now in order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order for me to ask my colleague [Mr. ANCONA] to amend his resolution so as to instruct the committee to report the amounts of mileage now paid to members respectively?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered, and there is a motion pending to lay the resolution on the table. Debate, therefore, is not now in order.

The question was taken on laying the resolution upon the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 74.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. KELLEY submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House be granted to the United States Christian Commission, on the evening of Sunday, the 11th of February, for the purpose of holding its anniversary meeting.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 84, noes 32.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 38, not voting 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Chester D. Hubbard, Jones, Ketcham, McIndoe, Myers, Newell, Patterson, Rousseau, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—77.

John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Boyer, Brandegee, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hill, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Noell, Phelps, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, and Elihu B. Washburne—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Blaine, Cullom, Culver, Dumont, Eliot, Grider, Harris, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Jones, George B. Lawrence, McIndoe, McCruer, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Rousseau, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, and Wright—27.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. McCULLOUGH stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, was absent from his seat on account of sickness.

TEST OATH FOR ATTORNEYS AT LAW.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of 24th January, 1865, relating to the test oath, as to allow attorneys at law to practice their professions without taking said oath, on an equal footing with the members of all other professions.

Mr. STEVENS. If there is no objection I will say one word by way of explanation. By the act to which reference has been made in the resolution, and which was well enough during the war, attorneys at law were prohibited from practicing their profession without taking an oath that they had never been engaged in the rebellion. Members of no other professions were required to take that oath. Since the war is over, these attorneys, desiring to resume the practice of their profession and to make a living at it, are prohibited from practicing by that law. I can see no objection to their being put upon an equal footing with all other professions. Hence I offer this resolution of inquiry.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the resolution; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 78, noes 38.

Mr. SPALDING called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 77, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Bergen, Blow, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Cobb, Cook, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Denison, Driggs, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKruer, Miller, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, and Winfield—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, John L. Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Broomall, Cullom, Culver, Dumont, Garfield, Harris, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Jones, Ketcham, McIndoe, Myers, Newell, Patterson, Rousseau, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—23.

So the resolution was agreed to.

INTER-STATE COMMUNICATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, which the House asked to be returned from the Senate, is on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that bill was passed by the House be reconsidered, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A question has arisen with reference to the construction of that bill; and I think that the question ought properly to be decided by that committee. I trust there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the vote by which the bill was passed will be regarded as reconsidered, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to report on this subject at any time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules that I may make that motion.

The motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

FURNITURE OF EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the consent of the House to make a very brief statement, the result of an actual examination by a committee, touching a libel published in a New York paper, upon the late President of the United States and his widow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. KASSON. On Friday last—I believe that was the day—a very bitter partisan paper of New York city published a statement involving the charge of larceny, by direct action or by consent, against both the late President and the unfortunate lady who was bereaved under circumstances so well known to the country, and the world, charging in point of fact that public property, bought and paid for by the United States, had been by them removed from the White House for their private advantage. I wish, at this early stage, before falsehood has traveled with too great speed over this country and abroad, to say to the House, and through the House to the country, that at the time that charge was made the Committee on Appropriations, in considering the propriety of additional appropriations for refurnishing the White House, were making an examination touching the alleged disappearance of property from the Executive Mansion; and the result of that investigation, with the examination of numerous witnesses, is this: that, with one single exception, not one solitary article ever paid for by the money of the United States can be found to have been removed, by any authority whatever connected with the occupancy of the White House, from the possession of the officer in charge of the mansion.

The only instance which is found which could possibly furnish a foundation for the charge is that one article used familiarly in the White House for some years was stated by the widow of the late President to have been the object of his admiration, and, as associated with him, she asked permission that that might be taken with her private property from the White House. Instead of taking it without leave, the matter was stated to the officer in charge, by him to the Commissioner of Public Buildings, by him to the present Secretary of the Interior, who said that, under the circumstances, he could not believe that the people of this country or any part of them would be opposed to her taking from the mansion that memento associated with the memory of her late husband. The whole value of it was perhaps one hundred and fifty dollars. With that exception, not one single article has been removed, so far as the committee could find; and some dozen witnesses living and occupying at the White House subordinate positions, and associated with that House have been examined.

And I wish, sir, to ask at this time that the Associated Press, that the manhood of the House, that the magnanimity of the country, may not only crush the slander, but, if possible, crush the slanderers who dared to attack a woman bereaved of her husband, and the widow of a President martyred for the sake of his country, as the President was.

Mr. HIGBY. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question. To what paper does the gentleman refer?

Mr. KASSON. I learned from the New York Herald that it was produced in a paper styled "Ben Wood's paper," in New York city. I take that paper to be the New York Daily News. I have not seen the paper, but I give the authority on which my statement has been made.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say further that the charge of a large number of boxes which appeared at the White House and were removed from it, turns out to be that a large number of them were little boxes in which the lady of the White House was accustomed to send to officers of the Army and others of her friends bouquets of flowers from the White House, which she had a perfect right to do.

Mr. SPALDING. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the injunction of secrecy has been removed from the proceedings before the committee to which he refers, and whether he now speaks by authority of that committee?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I have deemed it to be due, as one member of that committee, to make the statement to the country that I now make, in order at least that no credit may be given to the charge in the absence of all proof, and when, so far as we have examined, there is no authority for it at all.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman profess to be the mouth-piece of the committee, or only to speak for himself?

Mr. KASSON. I speak for myself as a member of the committee, and as a man designing deliberately to defend the reputation of a defenseless woman, associated as she has been with our martyred President.

Mr. STEVENS. That is all right; but I beg leave to say that the House will distinctly understand that what the gentleman has stated is no decision that this committee of the House has come to. I do not say what decision that committee may come to; but I say simply that they have come to no conclusion on the subject.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman will not state that the result, so far as it has gone, is not what I have stated it to be.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not mean to say anything about it, because it would be improper. All I wish to say is that the gentleman is not the voice of that committee.

Mr. KASSON. I have the authority, for what I have stated, of one person who has participated in the examination.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the regular order of business.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The morning hour having expired, the House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; on which Mr. Kasson was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me in regard to the question now before the House.

Mr. KASSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, I saw a paragraph, reported in the Globe, of the speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] when giving his views of the effect of this bill, that I desire may be read to the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"This bill goes further than ever has pretended by any State where legislation has been had on the subject. If that bill passes, it allows the negroes not only to have the right to vote, but to become judges of the courts, mayors of the city, and to hold the highest offices within the gift of the qualified voters of the District. That is its effect, and it will not be contradicted by any one on the other side. As it has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, it not only allows these negroes to vote, but to hold any office to which they may be elected. Such a course would disgrace and degrade us before the nations of the earth. Shall this fair temple, which has been reared by the genius and wisdom of our fathers, be despoiled, and the city built in the name of Washington be so far insulted that a black man shall be mayor of the city or sit as judge in the capital of the United States; that a negro shall preside over the rights and liberties of white men and women in this District?"

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, the construction of the gentleman from New Jersey has led me to examine the bill and to see what was its effect. It has gone to the country that this is not only a bill extending the right of suffrage to the negro, but that it also renders him eligible to any of the offices within the gift of the people of this District. I say, sir, that I have examined the bill particularly and critically, and there is nothing expressed in the title of the bill, nor can I see anything of the kind in the language of the bill, from which such a construction could be drawn. It purports to be a bill to extend the right of suffrage, and the right of suffrage alone. I think there is nothing from which the gentleman can infer that the bill intended the colored people should be made eligible to office here. I would like to ask of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to state to the House whether such was the purpose of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. The purpose of the bill, as I understood it, when reduced to form, was to invest all the citizens of the District of Columbia with the right of citizenship. I did not consider anything beyond the primary question of giving them the right of suffrage. I did not know what would be its legal construction. Does the gentleman desire to know my wishes rather than my views?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to know the views of the gentleman as a lawyer as to its legal construction.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman desires it I will ask to have the bill read. My views are, as I have stated, that it invests all the citizens of the District with all the rights of citizenship.

Mr. ROGERS. Let us have the bill read.

A MEMBER objected.

Mr. KELLEY. I would add that if it should be found at the next election, or at any subsequent election, that there is in the District a black man so eminently superior to all the white men as that, in the face of the prejudice that now crushes the race, the white men should believe that he would make the best mayor, or alderman, or supervisor, that they could find, they should have a right to his preëminent service. I would inquire of the gentleman whether he believes that any citizen of the United States should be debarred from the right to hold office or to vote for the man whom he believes to be most capable to fill office.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will say in relation to that, that if such is the construction that is to be given to the bill, or if there is anything in it that will bear that construction, I shall at the proper time move to amend the bill in that respect, restricting its operations solely to the right of suffrage in the District, not making it include eligibility to office.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I ask unanimous consent to correct a mistake made by the Printer of the House in joint resolution No. 1. In the ninth line, as printed, the provision reads, "And Representatives shall be appointed among the several States." It should be, "And Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the correction has been made.

RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad in California, to Portland, in Oregon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

G. C. LANPHIER.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of G. C. Lanphier; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LIEUTENANT JOSEPH TIFT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to restore Lieutenant Joseph Tift to his grade in active service in the Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution, submitting to the Legislatures of the several States propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill provides that Representatives be apportioned among the several States according to the number of male citizens over twenty-one years of age, having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that Congress, at their first session after the ratification, shall provide for the actual enumeration of voters, and such actual enumeration shall be separately made in a general census every ten years. The number of Representatives not to exceed one for every one hundred and twenty-five thousand inhabitants.

UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] I move to reconsider the motion by which the resolution was passed granting the use of this House to the United States Christian Commission, and that that motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who introduced the bill regulating suffrage in the District of Columbia, spoke the other day he announced his confidence in the opinion of the fathers of the country, and particularly of Madison, touching the proper construction of the Constitution of the United States. In that connection he criticized the declaration of the President of the United States in his message, touching the construction of the Constitution as to the power of Congress to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several States. He suggested, it seemed to me, somewhat patronizingly toward the President, that his engagements as Governor of the State of Tennessee rendered it impracticable for him to ascertain the opinions of the fathers of the country, and he is to be excused for his error, but still that it is an error, particularly concerning Mr. Madison's opinion upon the construction of the Constitution. I wish, before entering directly upon the bill in dispute, to call attention to the declarations upon this subject which he introduced into his speech. He says, after criticizing and opposing the declarations of President Johnson:

"I turn to James Madison to vindicate the sagacity of the founders of our Government. Those founders built not for a generation but for all time. They were skillful architects, and understood the laws and principles of the business they undertook. They built by square and compass and rule, and omitted neither corner-stone nor keystone from any arch in the temple they constructed to be the abode of freedom in all time. They made it the duty of the United States Government to guarantee to each State a republican form of Government; and having done that they did not fail to provide the means by which the Government on which they had laid that duty should be able to perform it. And they gave Congress the amplest power to execute that section, when, in section four, article one, they provided that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

And, then, in order to support his declaration, that under the word "manner" in that clause of the Constitution the Government of the United States has a right to prescribe the qualifications of voters, he cites from Elliott's Debates the following declaration of Mr. Madison:

"Some States might regulate the elections on the principle of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

Under that declaration he teaches this House, and, through the House, the country, what I regard as the dangerous doctrine that there is no absolute right left to a State in this Union to prescribe the qualifications of voters within that State. I repudiate it as a construction of the Constitution; I repudiate it as a proper construction of the language of Mr. Madison; and I ask the attention of the House to it, especially of those who are accustomed to regard the opinions of Madison, Jefferson, Hamilton, and the framers of the Constitution as controlling guides in the construction of that instrument. The gentleman from Pennsylvania failed to read that other clause of the Constitution preceding the one which he quoted, which declares expressly that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

He therefore assumes that this express declaration of the Constitution of the United States is overruled by that general declaration that the "manner" of the election of members of Congress may be controlled by the Congress of the United States.

Now, sir, perhaps, the first question to consider is what is the proper rule for the construction of the Constitution; and I appeal to the gentleman's own authority upon that subject, namely, President Madison. Mr. Madison, in a letter to Mr. Hurlbert, dated May, 1830, which is to be found in the fourth volume of the works of Madison, page 73, gives the rule in the following language:

"I refer particularly to the construction you seem to put on the introductory clause, 'we, the people,' &c., and on the phrases 'common defense and general welfare.'"

And let me say, Mr. Speaker, we have been very apt for the last few years to assume that we have very wide powers indeed under these general introductory phrases of the Constitution. Mr. Madison says what was meant by them in the following language:

"Either of these, if taken as a measure of the powers of the General Government, would supersede the elaborate specifications which compose the body of the instrument, in contravention to the fairest rules of interpretation. And if I am to answer your appeal to me as a witness, I must say that the real measure of the powers meant to be granted to Congress by the Convention, as I understood and believe, is to be sought in the specifications to be expounded, indeed, not with the strictness applied to an ordinary statute by a court of law, nor, on the other hand, with a latitude that, in the name of means for carrying into execution a limited Government would transform it into a Government without limits."

That was the declaration of Mr. Madison, and the rule that, in his judgment, ought to guide us in the interpretation of the Constitution. I put it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that Mr. Madison never intended that this general declaration in regard to "time, place, and manner" was to supersede the explicit declaration of the Constitution that left the regulation of the suffrage as a reserved right to the States.

But, sir, I am not left merely to the declaration of the rule of construction by Mr. Madison. I cite from the same letter the following declaration:

"States can, through forms of the constitutional elective provisions, control the General Government. This [the General Government] has no agency in electing State governments, and can only control them through the functionaries, particularly the Judiciary, of the General Government."

Thus he expressly repudiates the idea that we can interfere in the election of State governments, and declares that they, by their constitutions fixing the qualifications of voters, may control the General Government as far as it may be controlled by prescribing the qualifications of electors.

Well, sir, if it is still doubted or disputed that my statement of the views of Mr. Madison is correct, I will ask the Clerk to read from the Federalist the declaration of Mr. Madison, which entered into the consideration of the country at the time it adopted the Constitution of the United States, that they may learn explicitly that President Johnson was not in error, and that this very dangerous power was not conceded to the General Government. I refer to the passage, from paper No. 52 of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, touching the proper construction to be given to that clause. It reinforces the opinion of Mr. Madison, in 1830, by his deliberate construction given prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"From the more general inquiries pursued in the four last papers I pass on to a more particular examination of the several parts of the Government. I shall begin with the House of Representatives. The first view to be taken of this part of the Government relates to the qualifications of the electors and the elected. Those of the former are to be the same with those of the electors of the most numerous branch in the State Legislatures. The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as the fundamental principle of republican government. It was incumbent on the Convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of Congress would have been improper, for the reason just mentioned; and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. To have reduced the different regulations in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitution in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is evident that something else than the direct repeal of the explicit clause quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was meant by Mr. Madison in his declaration made in the convention of Virginia. It is evident that by the word "manner" is meant something else; perhaps whether by ballot or viva voce, by general ticket or by separate districts, and all other things that come properly under the term "manner." But it evidently was never intended by Mr. Madison, or by the framers of the Constitution, or by the people when they adopted it, that the Legislatures and conventions of the several States might be deprived of the power to say who should be the qualified electors of the State Legislatures, and indirectly the qualified electors of members of Congress; and the declarations I have cited, made at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and again some forty years afterwards, are ample to show that fact.

I speak with more seriousness upon this subject, because in time of war I am for a construction of the Constitution favorable to effective power in the General Government. It is necessary that there shall be central power and vigor in its operations at that time; but in time of peace I am equally for the powers of the States, and all doubtful constructions to be given in favor of the States for the preservation of that municipal liberty which is the very foundation of the grand national liberty attempted to be secured by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman says that it is very evident that Mr. Madison did not mean what I suggested. Will he permit me briefly to recall Mr. Madison's own language to his attention in this respect? And I will add, the subject which he was discussing was entirely apart from the question, whether the vote should be by ballot or viva voce, which he had discussed elsewhere, when Mr. Madison says this:

"Some of the States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality; and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some of the States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State, by any means, be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was adjudged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

ously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some of the States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State, by any means, be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was adjudged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

The question was not, I repeat, whether the people should vote by ballot or viva voce; but whether the people could be deprived of the right of suffrage, and if they were so deprived whether the General Government could not remedy the evil. Again, he says:

"It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity."

And finally he said:

"Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory, and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

I have sent for, and hope to obtain, another extract, which, should I do so, I will ask leave to submit during the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa. It as directly pointed to the question of the right of suffrage as the citations I have submitted.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, this is but a renewed declaration of the statements which the gentleman made the other day, and which are so explicitly controverted by the direct language of Mr. Madison upon the other clause of which I speak. I say that prima facie "manner" does not embrace electoral qualifications, and it is absurd to declare that the Constitution intended, or that Mr. Madison understood the Constitution as intending, by the word "manner," to give to Congress the right to prescribe the qualifications of electors, in the face of the direct declaration that those qualifications were to be the same as those of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he does now and here maintain that Congress has the right to prescribe the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I do affirm, promising to produce quotations sustaining the affirmation, that James Madison did maintain that Congress had that right; that, inasmuch as it had the right to regulate the question of suffrage, and as those who voted for the lower branch of the State Legislature were to vote for officers of the United States Government, Congress had the right to determine who might thus vote. I unhappily have not the authority by me; but I will produce it.

Mr. KASSON. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the issue is now sharp and well defined—

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me a moment, that I may ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain what, according to his view, is the meaning of the first clause of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, which reads thus:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is not perhaps aware that I read that clause as the foundation of my intercolony with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROGERS. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not undertaken to say what that clause means, why it is there, what its object is.

Mr. KASSON. I understand him to say that, although it is there, the Congress of the United States has the right, under the other clause, to change it.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir. I mean to say that James Madison said that to give effect to all the provisions of the Constitution, and pointing directly to the one referred to, it was essential that the power which he asserted for Congress should have been confided to it by the Constitution. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. KASSON. I resume, Mr. Speaker, and I say that I like a sharp and well-defined issue; and on the position which the gentleman assumes, that the Congress of the United States, under the word "manner" in the Constitution, has the right to say who shall vote and who shall not vote in the State of Iowa or any other State, I do explicitly take issue with him.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I hope that the gentleman will present the issue correctly. It is not upon our abstract opinions; it is as to the expressed opinion of James Madison. That is the issue.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not mean to indorse the opinion of James Madison, why did he quote it? What does he mean by throwing upon the country an interpretation of the Constitution in that way on the authority of James Madison, unless he means to indorse it.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman wishes to raise that issue, I say that I am for the Constitution in all its breadth; I am for it as it was understood by Washington and Madison; I am for it as embodying all those powers which Washington and Madison considered essential to its maintenance; and I am for it with the power inhering in Congress to so regulate the suffrage as to give the right of suffrage to every male citizen of the country of twenty-one years of age, whether a citizen by birth or naturalization. Now we have the two issues: the one as to what doctrine Madison maintained, and the other as to which of us, the gentleman from Iowa or myself, is right in our construction of the Constitution.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not come to the point. He neither accepts the declaration of Mr. Madison, nor does he expressly repudiate it.

Mr. KELLEY. I did and do accept it.

Mr. KASSON. It is not enough for the gentleman to say to me that he agrees with Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, and is for the Constitution in its breadth. I agree with him in that respect; I am for the Constitution in its breadth. I am also for the Constitution in its narrowness, if narrowness exists. I am for the Constitution either way. And I say, and on this I have made issue with the gentleman, that the Constitution does not contemplate, and Mr. Madison does not claim it as contemplating, that the Congress of the United States shall have the right to prescribe who shall vote in my State or any other State for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Now, sir, I take that issue again. I referred to the Federalist, No. 52, which I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] did not hear, in which Mr. Madison, over his own well-known signature, declared that it was expressly committed to the State governments to determine that; for in that way they indirectly determined who should vote for members of Congress, and it was unsafe to give it to the Congress of the United States.

Sir, we have had during the war necessarily a great disposition, in which I have shared, to allow the Constitution of the United States to be interpreted broadly—broadly in the interests of the integrity of the country; broadly for the prosecution of the war; broadly for the maintenance of the life of the Union; and I have not one single declaration I have ever made in that direction to take back at this time.

I say that it is one of the glories of that Constitution, it is one of the elements of perpetual national safety involved in that Constitution, that it is flexible in its application to times and events, and in this war the liberal construction of it, in my judgment, has secured the triumphs of the armies of the Union. In time of peace the further prosecution of an interpretation of the Constitution toward a centralization of the power of the Federal Government, or the broad interpretation that takes from the States the right of prescribing the qualification of electors to the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, is most dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people of the United States; and I desire to enter my solemn protest against that construction.

Sir, the question is before my State to-day whether they will strike the word "white" out of the State constitution prescribing the qualification of the electors. I think that the word "white" should be stricken out of the State constitution, because that would enable our Legislature to allow qualified colored men to vote, which it cannot now do.

Now, shall we allow this Congress, when composed of Democratic majorities, to come in and say to my State that we shall not allow the black men to vote, even for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature? No, sir, the Constitution secures expressly the right to each State to determine that, and their determining that determines who shall vote for members of the Congress of the United States. And this is an inherent power in the States that we should guard with great jealousy; and we should not allow ourselves to give currency to the declaration that Congress, representing all States of the Union, may, by majorities combined from other States, declare the qualification in any State of persons who shall be permitted to vote therein.

Now, I leave that subject to the consideration of the House, and I will call attention, as briefly as I can, to the rules that, in my judgment, ought to be applied to this question of the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia. I wish it were possible for us to admit those things which cannot be disputed, and reject those things which, as worthy of rejection, cannot be disputed, and come right down to the single narrow point involved in this debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman whether this bill denies to the States the right to fix the qualifications of the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures.

Mr. KASSON. Perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not hear or read the speech of his colleague from Philadelphia, [Mr. KELLEY,] who is the father of this bill, and in which he raised that point of debate; I therefore deem it proper to reply to that portion of his speech.

Now, sir, what is the proposition before the House to-day? It is, shall the black people of the District of Columbia be permitted to participate in the future elections of the District as fully as the white population under existing laws are allowed to participate in them? This raises the question touching the proper foundation of the right of suffrage. If it be a natural right, if it be one of those rights like personal liberty, like the right of exercising personal conscience, then, sir, I am for it as heartily as I was for the amendment to the Constitution, which secured the right of personal liberty to every human being in the United States.

If on the other hand the right of suffrage is a conventional right; is one that is rightfully more or less restricted as the laws of the land may prescribe; if every citizen has not the right to demand a vote, then, of course, it is a matter for the discretion of this House how many persons shall be authorized to exercise it.

Now, sir, in the history of this country we have excluded certain classes generally from taking part in the election. We have excluded the Chinese, we have excluded all pagans, we have excluded Indians as a general rule, we have excluded white males under twenty-one years of age, we have excluded women of all ages irrespective of intelligence or tax paying. We have thus actually, through the whole history of this country, recognized certain qualifications as necessary for participating in the elections by which our Government is controlled, and I may add that in most of the States the black population has been wholly or partially excluded. I do not know of any one State in which, irrespective of qualification, they are permitted to vote. In my own State we have had the word "white" in our constitution, and we have been considering the question of allowing the black man to vote. The party to which I belong in the State of Iowa passed this resolution at their last convention:

Resolved, That with proper safeguards for the purity of the ballot-box, the elective franchise shall be based upon loyalty to the Constitution and Union, recognizing and affirming the equality of all men before the law; therefore we are in favor of amending the constitution of our State by striking out the word 'white' in the article of suffrage."

And, sir, although we had nearly forty thousand majority the previous year, we had only about sixteen thousand this year in the State. There was a very great difference of opinion in the State touching the propriety of the introduction of this resolution. Some counties in their conventions declared that it was but a proposition to submit to the vote of the people, which it would require three years to give effect to, whether or not they should be allowed to vote; in other words, whether the word "white" should be stricken out; and they postponed, in many instances, the consideration of the question and adhered to the ticket. The State has not yet pronounced on the subject, and I have in my hand a late copy of the State party organ, which uses the following language, the Legislature being in session, and the subject being before them for the first step of action. After claiming that the proposition should be early submitted to the people, the editor says:

"Intelligence should be the chief basis of suffrage, as it is the only guarantee of perpetuity in a free Government, and we trust that Iowa may be the first among the States of the Northwest to ingraft this principle in its fundamental law."

That declaration is made by one of the most radical newspapers in Iowa—the organ of the party in the State.

Mr. PRICE. I ask my colleague whether or no the question of negro suffrage was brought squarely before the voters of Iowa at the last election. Let him answer yes or no.

Mr. KASSON. It was brought before the electors of Scott county in which my colleague resides, which had been the banner county of the State, so called, and I think something like twelve hundred majority at the previous election was reduced to some fifty or sixty, by which they were just able to elect their members to the Legislature. That was the result of the square indorsement of the proposition. Perhaps other things were involved in the issue; that I do not undertake to say; but there was a square indorsement. In my own county the convention passed a resolution, the sense of which I stated before, namely, that it was a mere proposition to submit the amendment to the people, and that, therefore, it ought not to be a test in the present canvass.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the question again, and I want my colleague to answer me yes or no.

Mr. KASSON. I cannot yield to such a persistent determination of the gentleman. I have attempted to answer the question, and I now answer it again. It was put before the people by the resolution which I have read here to the House, that provides proper safeguards for the purity of the ballot-box; and those safeguards, I maintain, involve, evidently, the question of loyalty and intelligence. Then in different counties the conventions took different policies, and speakers took different lines of argument.

Mr. PRICE. I pledge this House to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. KASSON. No sir. If the gentleman has simply a question to ask or a fact to state I yield.

Mr. PRICE. I ask my colleague for an answer yes or no, and not a circuitous one; going all around the course. Was the question brought squarely before the voters of Iowa at the last election whether they would have negro suffrage in the State? I do not care which way he answers it.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I have answered the question already by reading the resolution. I have also stated the action of county conventions, and the fact that different speakers took different positions. What more can the gentleman ask?

Mr. PRICE. Yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. Well, sir, I do not see how the gentleman will succeed in getting an answer which involves the truth more effectually than I have stated it now. Of course it was before the people of the country when the people took opposite sides upon it. What does the gentleman mean by asking me to give him an answer, yes or no?

Mr. PRICE. I tried to get a straight answer from you.

Mr. KASSON. Perhaps I ought to say to this House, in view of this interpolation and its temper, that during the holidays just past, my colleague saw fit to address a meeting in his town which adopted a resolution excepting the humble member now speaking from an expression of its confidence. I will certainly answer in all courtesy his questions, but of course I must equally decline to have perpetual interruptions after I have answered them.

Mr. PRICE. I will not interrupt the gentleman any more. I will answer him when he has done.

Mr. KASSON. I resume, then. The question of negro suffrage was put in that way, involving the question of proper safeguards for the purity of the ballot-box; and among those safeguards, as I have shown by the declarations of the leading Republican paper of that State—an exceedingly radical paper—intelligence is recognized as one. I appeal to gentlemen of this House, especially those who were scholars in the common schools of the country, if we have not all learned from our childhood that the very basis of security of a republican Government is found in the intelligence and virtue of the people who control it. I have learned that from my infancy. I cannot unlearn it at the dictation of any man or set of men. I believe that the people control this Government. I believe that if those people have not intelligence to understand the policy and principles of our Government to a reasonable extent, our institutions are unsafe and liable to be upset. I also believe in my heart and in my conscience that if you make suffrage universal in certain districts of the Union where ignorance actually predominates, you have no security in those districts that the institutions to which we are attached will retain their permanence.

Why, sir, look at those countries where mixed bloods have controlled the Government by universal suffrage. Look at Mexico and the South American republics, where revolutions are as frequent almost as the revolutions of the seasons. Look at the Latin races of the world, and where have they ever succeeded in establishing a permanent and reliable republican Government controlled by the will of the people?

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman's argument to be only against ignorant negro suffrage or equally against all ignorant suffrage?

Mr. KASSON. I was coming to that point presently. I will say that my argument militates against ignorance in the qualification of electors wherever found. There is another consideration, however, involved in its application to existing electors of which I shall speak presently.

Mr. KELLEY. With the gentleman's permission I will ask him whether he believes that the negro race has such mental or physical superiority in this country that, being but five million, it will, in spite of the fact that there is no negro immigration and a very large white immigration into the country, so diffuse itself into the American people as to make us a mixed race?

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will look at the census of 1860, he will find that in two States at the South negroes have a numerical majority, and that in other States they are so nearly equal with the white population that a few whites coöperating with them would be able to secure for any purpose control of the State government. That is my reply.

Take those countries where the blacks have succeeded in securing their own Governments, as in Hayti, and you find there revolution after revolution; you find that in Hayti, instead of establishing a republican form of government, they have adopted an imperial form and sustained an emperor at their head.

Now, sir, I state these things because they are facts known to the members of this House. I do not want to state mere opinions, to any extent, in the debate upon this question. I state the fact that this race of ours, known first as the Caucasian, and subordinately as the Anglo-Saxon, has developed the principles of self-government, and has protected itself under free institutions, more or less perfect, beyond any other race, white or black, and beyond any other modification of the Caucasian race; and hence it is that I say we should be very careful before, in any part of this country, we allow the power of this Government to pass to another race which has not yet developed its ability to administer it.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to remark just in connection with the gentleman's allusion to the States in which revolutions occur so frequently, that it seems to me that it was in view of a possible contingency of this kind, in the vastly expanding area of the Union, that Madison and the fathers provided that there should be a regulating power in the Government; so that if any State degenerated toward monarchy, or imperialism, or anarchy, the hand of Congress could be put upon it and the government be restored to the hands of the majority of the whole people.

Mr. KASSON. We left some time ago the opinions of Mr. Madison and the fathers of the country, and I must ask the gentleman to make his interruptions upon the point of debate now before the House. No one denies, as I understand it, that the Latin race, that the mixed races of Indian and Latin, or the mixed race of blacks and whites, or any other races, have developed, as the Anglo-Saxon race has done, the power to govern itself, and to preserve the principles of self-government after they have established them. The gentleman does not deny this, nor do I understand any gentleman to deny—if there be one, I will give way to him for the purpose—that in some parts of this country the negro race, if universally entitled to suffrage, would have absolute power, and in others would have power, with the aid of a few whites, to get control of the State governments and modify them to the full extent allowed by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yield to me for a moment, and for the last time?

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. I propose to ask the gentleman whether, if the colored man in those two States, South Carolina and Mississippi, had had the right of suffrage when the question of ordinances of secession was submitted to the people, he believes such ordinances of secession would have been passed; or whether secession was not carried because suffrage was withheld from the loyal masses of the people?

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] if he must interrupt me, will at least confine his interruptions to the point under debate. I will trust that much to his courtesy. He is entirely wide of the point of debate now. I will come presently to the principles which ought to be applied.

The colored residents of this District are composed of two classes. One, the old residents of the District, and the other the class of immigrating blacks who have come in mostly from the States of Maryland and Virginia. Now, I do not deny for a moment that a black, intelligent, able to read and write, and paying taxes, has a right to be represented. But while the principle upon which a great fundamental privilege should be conferred will result in the admission of a portion of the black race to the exercise of the right of suffrage, let us also adopt a policy statesmanlike and safe for the interests of our country. The safety and well-being of the blacks themselves depend upon your admitting them to the exercise of this right by degrees, and basing their exercise of the right of suffrage upon their intelligence.

Much has been said here about the right of suffrage being a natural right; that it is a right pertaining to humanity to enable it to defend itself in a free Government like ours. I call the attention of gentlemen upon this floor to the fact that if it be a natural right, indisputable to the preservation of the freedom of the individual, and the preservation of equality before the law, then it is our duty to extend it much beyond any proposition that has been yet presented to this House. So conscious of that was that eminent and admirable orator and logician, who spoke in this House some time ago, as a representative of the Freedmen's Aid Commission—I refer to Rev. Henry Ward Beecher—that he was obliged to go beyond the question now before this House and declare that women ought to be permitted to vote, because it was necessary to the exercise of a natural right. He went the whole length. And I maintain that any gentleman of this House must go the whole length, or else agree with me that we have the right to qualify the electoral system by declaring that certain qualifications should exist in the electors of the country.

Now, sir, in prescribing these qualifications, if you will look to the history of the country, you will find that women have not been permitted to vote, even after they have attained the age of twenty-one years, although they might be unmarried, are taxed, and even hold offices under the Government of the United States, and are, in all other respects, equal before the law with the men. You will find that equality before the law does not mean the exercise of the right of suffrage. Even service in the Army of the country does not give this right, for one fourth of the gallant men composing the armies of the United States at one time were men of less than twenty-one years of age. If qualification to exercise the right of suffrage is to be determined as a natural right, and to secure equality before the law, you must let all of them vote, whether twenty-one years of age or not. For a man old enough to fight for his country ought to be old enough to vote for his country.

Now, sir, I have for myself thought it proper that we should fall back upon the declarations of Mr. Lincoln and Thomas Jefferson upon this subject. Mr. Lincoln's opinions are well known, that the intelligent negro and the fighting negro, of proper age, should be allowed to vote, the first for his intelligence, the second for his military service. Secondly, I would add the taxpayer, because with taxation should go representation.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the time of the gentleman [Mr. KASSON] be extended so as to enable him to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Jefferson declared, as follows:

"The true foundation of republican government is the equal right of every citizen in his person and property, and in their management. Let every man who fights or pays exercise his just and equal right in election."

Again he says:

"Among men who either pay or fight for their country no line can be drawn."

Now, sir, without arguing this question at length, I desire to state here, and to place myself upon record, that I am in favor of the Jeffersonian and Lincolnian proposition, and opposed to the extension of the right of suffrage universally to everybody in the United States of America. I am opposed to this bill, because it does not exclude rebels from voting at the elections in this District. I am opposed to it, also, because it imposes no qualification at all upon the new people who are to be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage. It also makes no provision for the registration of voters, and we know that the class of persons which this bill is intended especially to reach are a very migratory people, and it ought to be well guarded in that particular before it is passed by this House.

Much has been said in this debate about the gallantry of the negro troops, and about the number of negro troops in the war. Gentlemen have declared here so broadly that we were indebted to them for our victories as to actually convey the impression that they won nearly all the victories accomplished by the armies of the United States, and that to them are we indebted for the salvation of our country and our triumph over the rebellion.

I do not agree with them in the extent of their praise, nor the grounds upon which it has been placed. One gentleman, I think it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania, speaks of our debt to the negroes, because they have fought our battles for us. That I may not misrepresent him, I quote his language:

"I cannot bear to be goaded and taunted by those whom I treat as inferiors, that in the hour of my danger when I refused or was unable to fight, they took up my battle and healed my wounded honor. The negroes fought for me, and God forbid that they should ever taunt me or my descendants with the fact that I was an ingrate to the soldiers of the Republic."

Now, sir, I say that this is a falsification of the condition of the negroes, and of the history of the country in this particular. Those negroes fought for their liberty, which was involved in the preservation of the Union of the States. They fought with us to accomplish the maintenance of the integrity of the country, which carried with it the liberty of their own race; and what would have been said of the negroes if they had not, under such circumstances, come forward and united with us? I told the people of my State, and of other States, during the war, that one effect of our success in it would be the emancipation of the negroes and the establishment throughout the country of the great principle of human liberty. When I urged the support of the Government in carrying on the war, I was told by the Opposition, and I admitted, that we were fighting in such a manner that the negroes should be free. I say now that we, the white race, fought the battles of the negro as well as our own; and if the negro himself had not come forward and enlisted in our armies, we should have been obliged to mourn over it, and to say that no element of manhood existed in that race.

Now, sir, we are able to say that the element of manhood does exist in them; that they became our auxiliaries; that they came forward as the white men did, with additional motives beyond our own, but no better than the white men; and that we of the white race, filling up our armies by hundreds of thousands, welcomed their aid. Both races fought gallantly. But when gentlemen say, as I think the distinguished Representative from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] did the other day, in his interpolation in the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] that they fought and won for us the victory, I protest against it in the name of the gallant armies composed of white soldiers throughout the United States.

Who was it that broke the arch of the rebellion at Fort Donelson? I find that a regiment of Iowa troops—white troops, not colored troops—were the first to cross the bristling abatis and charge upon the enemy, leaving many a length of white manhood upon the ground; but I see no negro troops at that time. I look at Vicksburg, and I find among the thousands who died in the trenches and in the assault simply white soldiers. I find the black troops and the white together at Port Hudson. When Sherman's army made that grand march which has become historical; when, with the steady force of a slow-moving glacier, and with the audacity of an avalanche, that great military leader descended from the North, and dissipated the enemy in front, and made that famous march to the sea; when he returned from the sea to the mountains of the North, sweeping resistlessly every enemy before him, and accomplishing a result that has not only made his name historical, but has made in the history of this country a chapter reading like a romance; when he arrived at the termination of his march, and crushed the last fragment of the rebellion between the upper millstone of Grant's army and the nether millstone of the grand western army, I do not read that one black soldier was with him to aid in accomplishing that great result.

When Sheridan turned the right flank of the enemy before Richmond, and succeeded in gaining the fatal advantage of the rebel army, though directed by the most gallant commander of the rebellion, do we find negro troops among those who inflicted upon the head of the rebellion that decisive blow? No, sir, they were white troops that won success in that gallant enterprise which has covered the name of Sheridan with imperishable luster. Let us, then, do justice to white and black. Let us defend and give credit to those who deserve it, and to those to whom credit is due; and not cloud the fair fame of nine hundred thousand brave men of our own race by excluding them from the fame acquired by their glorious achievements.

And are we to be told here, in the face of these facts of history, that it is to the black race alone that we are indebted for the accomplishment of our great victory? I protest against any such assumption. While I yield to the negro troops the credit of having exhibited bravery and manhood when put to the test, I do not yield to them the exclusive or chief credit of having won the victory for the Government of my country in preserving this Union. Let us not, under false assertions of fact, send out to the country and the world from this floor the declaration that the white race of this country are wanting in the gallantry, the devotion, and the patriotism which ultimately secured for our armies triumph, and for our nation perpetuity.

Let the blacks who gallantly fought go and vote, let the white men who gallantly fought go and vote, let all these who did go and fight, and who can read and write, and thus understand the system of our Government; who can read the ballot with which they are attempting to control our country; let all these men go and vote if you will, and aid in the government of our country. But I have been taught, and so have you, so have we all, that unless intelligence exists in this country, unless schools are supported and education diffused throughout the country, our institutions are not safe, and either anarchy or despotism will be the result; and when you propose substantially to introduce at once three quarters of a million or a million of voters, the great mass of whom are ignorant and unable to tell when the ballot they vote is right side up, then I protest against such an alarming infusion of ignorance into the ballot-box, into that sacred palladium, as we have always called it, of the liberties of our country. Let us introduce them by fit degrees. Let them come in as fast as they are fit, and their numbers will not shock the character of our institutions.

I turn for a single moment to call attention to the philanthropy of the proposition. If you introduce all without regard to qualification, without their being able to read or write, and thus to understand the questions on which they are to decide, what would be the effect? You will take away from them the strongest incentive to learn to read or write. As a race, it is not accustomed to position and property; it has no homesteads, it has no stake in the country; and unless they are required to be intelligent, and qualified to understand something about our institutions and our laws, and the questions which are submitted to the people from time to time, you say then to them, "No matter whether or not you make progress in civilization or education, you shall have all the rights of citizenship," and in that way you take away from them all special motive to education and improvement. On the contrary, if the ability to read and write and understand the ballot is made the qualification on the part of these people to exercise the right of voting, the remaining portion will see that color is not exclusion. They would all aspire to the qualification itself as preliminary to the act. You can submit no motive to that race so powerful for the purpose of developing in them the education and intelligence required.

I say, therefore, on whatever grounds you put it, whether you regard the safety of our institutions or the light of philanthropy, you should insist on qualifications substantially the same as those required in the State of Massachusetts. I have a copy of the clause of the constitution of that State which seems to be the proper one on this subject. And let me say that, taking the State of Massachusetts as an example of the result of general intelligence and qualified suffrage, and a careful guardianship of the ballot-box, I know of no more illustrious example in this or any other country of its importance.

With a credit that surpasses that of the United States, with a history that is surpassed by no State in the Union, with wealth that is almost fabulous in proportion to its population, with a prosperity almost unknown in the history of the world, that State stands before us to-day in all her dignity, strength, wealth, intelligence, and virtue. And if we, by adopting similar principles in other States, can secure such results, we certainly have an inducement to consider well how far this condition is to be attributed to her diffused education, and to the provisions of her constitution. The electoral clause reads as follows:

"No person shall have the right to vote or be eligible to office who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his own name; Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by physical disability from complying with its requisition, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect."

It was thus that Massachusetts provided an improved element of suffrage without taking away any existing rights. The policy of excluding those who now have the right of suffrage should receive serious consideration before we adopt it. It is easier to withhold the right from a class who have not yet received it, than to take it away from those who have it. So far as it is prohibited for the future, as in the constitution of Massachusetts, it is comparatively free from objections.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will my colleague please state the date of the adoption of that amendment to the constitution of Massachusetts?

Mr. KASSON. It is but a few years ago that that clause was adopted; but the general principle of intelligence of which I spoke has been more thoroughly adopted in that State than in any other in the Union; and the schools of Massachusetts are model schools, unsurpassed by any in the Union.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The point to which I direct the attention of my colleague is this: all that the gentleman has said with regard to the State of Massachusetts and her schools I indorse; but I desire, while I do so, to impress upon the minds of members of this House that all that was accomplished before the adoption of the amendment by which they required persons to read the constitution in the English language; that it was not the adoption of that amendment which gave Massachusetts her high position, but it was that which existed before. And one other fact I will call his attention to; and that is that the action of Massachusetts, in relation to that amendment, was not aimed at the negro, but at the foreigner.

Mr. KASSON. I understand well the history of Massachusetts, and have already stated that I quoted this simply as a consummation of the principle that always existed in that State, namely, that a republic was founded upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, and that that principle should be applied elsewhere.

Mr. LYNCH. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to say that the state of things in Massachusetts is parallel to what it would be if the same provision were applied to the District of Columbia? Do I understand him, that if he applies the same principle here, it will work as impartially as it would when applied to Massachusetts?

Mr. KASSON. I can hardly say, if the gentleman asks me as to the details of the application of the provision in this District. I only know that there is a larger portion here who cannot read and write than in Massachusetts.

Mr. LYNCH. The point is this: that before the adoption of the constitutional amendment, all, both white and black, voted, so that the operation of that amendment was equally upon whites and blacks; but its adoption here would operate only on one class.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman probably does not observe the whole clause of the Constitution. When adopted it did not apply to those who at that time were allowed to vote; only to those who should subsequently be allowed to vote. Here it would operate in the future on both classes.

Mr. LYNCH. I understand that; but at that time whites and blacks had the right to vote, so that it included both classes alike. But the adoption of this provision will only exclude those who had a right to vote here, namely, the whites. It would not operate impartially on the blacks.

Mr. KASSON. I do not recollect what the qualification was at the time the gentleman refers to. I only say that the good sense and wisdom of Massachusetts finally called for the adoption of this provision, and that we, who used to be in the minority in this country for many years, have always asserted that, were it not for the ignorance that always went with the other party, we should have got into power a great deal earlier than we did.

I wish also to state one other thing in reference to this same question. Some gentlemen are of the opinion that if we give universal suffrage to these people they are always going to vote with us, and we shall always control their votes. There is no greater absurdity in the world than that we can continue to control that vote. The blacks will vote in accordance with their interests. If their employer is a man whose property is affected by the legislation proposed—whether it be in relation to taxing cotton or other raw material as against manufactures, or whatever else—the interest of the colored man would be identical with that of his employer; so that the interests of the two would become identified in a political party in all the policy of the country. So convinced was I of it that, in a debate in which I took part in the State of Kentucky on this subject, I asserted that in five years from this time the very men who would then be the employers instead of the owners of these black men would themselves be advocating the extension of the suffrage, because they would control the votes of the blacks, their interests being the same.

I believe that the planting interest throughout the South will yet—if we leave them free to act by construing the Constitution as I contend it ought to be construed, instead of taking to Congress the right to regulate the matter—be advocating the extension of the suffrage to the black race, because their interests will require it.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus stated the general propositions by which I stand, and which, I think, ought, to some extent at least, to guide the judgment of the House. I am happy to believe, from developments already made, that the majority of this House are indisposed to apply universal suffrage, without restriction of any kind, in this District or elsewhere. I am also happy to believe that it is a proposition likely to meet with favor, that those who left the District and took part in the rebellion should be excluded from the government of the District. Let amendments be made to the bill in this sense, and justice will be done.

I have spoken from a profound and conscientious conviction that this principle of universal suffrage could only be advocated by those who were ignorant of the actual condition of the black race, or else reckless of the effect it is likely to produce upon the permanence of our institutions. I have desired, in my humble way, to urge upon them the propriety of admitting the race by degrees to exercise with us the right of suffrage, that we may test their action under the influences by which they are now and will hereafter be surrounded, extending the privilege only as education and fitness qualify them for the exercise of the great right that stands at the foundation of our Government.

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. JULIAN. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

No objection was made.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I think it due to myself, I think it due to this House, I think it due to the country generally, and to the State of Iowa particularly, that I should make a plain statement of facts in reference to one part of my colleague's speech.

It will be remembered by this House that a few days since, during the course of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] I stated that the people of the State of Iowa had recently had the question of negro suffrage before them, and had decided in favor of negro suffrage. Now, to-day, my colleague, in his speech, takes issue with that and raises a question of veracity, and it is that question that I propose to settle in a very few moments.

My colleague read to you the resolution of the Republican convention of the State of Iowa, and read it correctly. Upon that resolution there was a discussion in the convention, some weak-backed Republicans being very fearful that we should lose the State if we passed such a resolution and went to the country upon it. Now, I want to state most explicitly and positively that the Republican party of Iowa went before the people of that State at the election for Governor and other officers upon that platform, definitely, distinctly, and positively made.

I want to state, also, in connection with that fact, that the other party—not the Democratic party, because they ignored all claim to Democracy; the other party—made up of the Democratic party and Republicans who did not like negro suffrage, placed upon their ticket, not a Democrat; no, sir; not a sympathizer with the rebellion; no, sir; they placed upon their ticket Colonel Thomas H. Benton, jr., a Republican, a man who had just come out of the war; and they placed him there simply and entirely because he was opposed to negro suffrage. They did not dare run a Democrat upon that ticket; they did not dare run any one but a man who was squarely and positively opposed to negro suffrage.

I must say for him that, morally, he is as good a man probably as we have in the State of Iowa; intellectually he is at least the equal of the man by whom he was beaten; and everybody in the State of Iowa knows, and if my colleague does not know it then he must not know what is going on in Iowa, that he was beaten on the issue of negro suffrage. I will say this for my colleague, if it be an excuse—and perhaps it is due that I should say it—that he made it convenient not to be in the State of Iowa very much during the discussion of this question. I guess he was not there at the election. If he was there he can speak.

I will say, also, that he wrote two letters, one from the plains, during that canvass, one of which was interpreted to mean anti-negro suffrage, taking the ground that if negroes were allowed to vote in the States where so many negroes were they would control the white voters. As it came nearer election day, and the hand-writing on the wall became more and more distinct, then my colleague wrote another letter, which was interpreted by those who read it and understood it, as they supposed, to mean a little more negro suffrage, not quite so anti as the first letter was, but whether it was for negro suffrage or not negro suffrage a great many there were in doubt. It placed them in the condition of the men who wrote the lines:

"Winding in and winding out,
They left the beholder still in doubt
Whether the snake that made the track
Was going south or coming back."

Now, I have not misunderstood this question, because the House will remember that when my colleague was making his speech a few minutes ago he said that we had forty thousand majority in Iowa at a certain election, and at this election but sixteen thousand majority. I am willing to take this evidence on that subject, and what does it prove? If it proves anything it proves—and that is what my colleague intended to prove by it—that the question of negro suffrage being before the people, it reduced the Republican or Union majority. If it did that, we had the question before us, and would it not have been very easy for my colleague to have answered my plain question and said to me "yes" or "no"? I gave him his choice and told him I did not care which way he answered.

But there are some men in this world so constituted that they cannot move straight forward to a certain point. I do not say that such is the case with any member of this House. I state it as a general principle. There are some men so constituted, either by education or by nature, I do not care which it may be, that they cannot move straight to any given point, but they must necessarily go around in a circle, upon the principle that the farthest way around is the safest. Now, the fact is, that we did not lose that majority entirely on the question of negro suffrage. We lost only between four and five thousand on the negro suffrage question. But that question was squarely in the issue in the late election. In the presidential election, when the whole vote of the State was brought out, our majority was about forty thousand. At the late election the majority for Governor was about sixteen thousand, and the balance of the ticket was a little over twenty thousand; the difference being in consequence of this negro suffrage question.

Now, have I not proved to this House, have I not proved to my colleague, [Mr. KASSON,] if he did not know it before, that this question was before the people of Iowa at the last election, and that I was correct when I made the declaration a few days ago in this House that we had had the question squarely before us, and the people of Iowa had pronounced in favor of negro suffrage by sixteen thousand majority?

My colleague referred to my county in regard to that vote. Now, in my county they had no Democratic ticket at all; but the opposition ticket was headed "Anti-negro suffrage." And in the third congressional district of the State of Iowa the Opposition ticket was headed "White man's ticket." Does not that prove to every man who wants to look at the matter squarely and in a common-sense view, that we had the question squarely before us at that election? And yet my colleague could not see it; could not answer "yes" or "no," when I put the plain question to him before this House; could not say whether the question was before us or not. Yet every man in the State of Iowa, with probably the exception of my colleague from the fifth district, knew that the question was before us. It was known on all sides, and stated in all the papers that the election would be decided on that question, and that the principle of negro suffrage was carried by sixteen thousand majority.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. Were there no other issues involved in that campaign beside the one of negro suffrage?

Mr. PRICE. I answer most explicitly that so far as the election of Governor was concerned no other issue was involved directly or indirectly. I answer that question fairly and squarely. Not being learned in the law I always answer "yes" or "no," or if I cannot do that I back out and let some one else answer who can. When I find I cannot answer "yes" or "no," I begin to think I do not understand the subject, and give way to some one who does understand it.

My colleague also refers to a meeting held in Iowa when I was at home during the holidays. Well, sir, I cannot help it if the people of the State of Iowa choose to call a meeting and to invite me to be present and to talk to them. I could help being present, it is true; but that would look so much like dodging that it would not be in accordance with my manner of doing business. The simple, unvarnished tale is this: when I went home I found that the people were intensely excited upon the question of negro suffrage and the question of reconstruction, and my neighbors and acquaintances came to see me—and I will say to my colleague that I have lived in Davenport more than twenty-one years, and the people there know me perfectly well—and said to me, "What are you going to do in Congress? Are you going to allow the rebel States to come in?" My answer was, "I do not know exactly what will be done; I do not think they will be allowed to come in before we can obtain some guarantees for the future; at least they will not come in with my vote before that is done."

They called a meeting at a place to which I was not in the habit of going very much, and invited me to be present and give them my views and observations on the subject. I went there, and talked to them as best I could, while I had anything to say. A gentleman near me asks me what kind of a place it was. I will say in reply that it was a theater; and I am not in the habit of going much to the theater, and am not presumed to be a very good actor in such places.

I am just reminded by the Speaker of this House, who sits near me at the present moment, that he once made a speech in the same place; and I will say in this connection that the meeting which I addressed was said to be the largest meeting which ever assembled there, except upon the occasion when the Speaker addressed the people of that portion of the country.

Now, sir, at the conclusion of that meeting the people there introduced some resolutions—pointed, direct, straightforward, uncompromising radical resolutions; and in those resolutions they took occasion to indorse the entire Iowa delegation in Congress, except my colleague from the fifth district. Now, as that meeting took place at my home, it might be supposed by strangers that I possibly might have had something to do with getting up those resolutions. But any man who knows me there or here would not charge me with that. I will say, however, to gentlemen of this House—it is not necessary I should say it to my colleague, as it has been said to him before—that I knew nothing more of those resolutions than the child unborn, until they were presented at that meeting. So much for that part of the history.

But I will say to the gentleman, as he has introduced this matter into the House in this way, that he is not indorsed by the people of Iowa in the course which he takes here, and that he does not represent even his own district upon that question, nor any other district in the State of Iowa. And no man who comes here from the State of Iowa and trims his course to suit the views of the slaveholders of the South will represent the people of that State, whether that be right or wrong.

But, sir, I do not know that I ought to complain, or that this House ought to complain, because this House well knows that history but repeats itself. Eighteen hundred years ago and more there were twelve men selected for a certain purpose. As this House will remember, two of those twelve men proved recreant to the great object for which they were called. One of them, for a certain sum of money, was led to do a thing which even in his own opinion was worthy of death, and consequently he went out and hanged himself. The other was guilty of profanity and falsehood. Taking two out of the twelve was one out of six, and there are just six Representatives from Iowa upon this floor. [Laughter.] I make no application. I merely state the facts as they exist.

This House will bear me testimony that I am not in the habit of making speeches. I have no speech written on this or any other subject. I had not intended to say one word on this question. But when my veracity on this subject is called in question, directly or indirectly, then I presume it is my duty, as well as my privilege, to defend myself and to defend the constituency that I represent upon this floor. And I will take this occasion to say—though it may not be a personal explanation, and I only have the floor for a personal explanation—that it is unjust to the negro to get up here and say that in the crushing of this rebellion, when the upper and nether millstones were brought to bear upon the forces in arms against the Government and the country—it is unjust, ungenerous, and beneath the dignity of any man, whether white or black, to say that the negroes were not in at the death. Does not every man in this country know that the negroes took up arms in defense of the old flag just as soon as this Government would allow them to do so? Again, and again, and again, they besought this Government, in every possible way, to be allowed to do something for the defense of the Government and the suppression of the rebellion. But the Government, until a certain period, drove them back, returned them to chains and slavery, said to them, "We have no use for you; you cannot be permitted within our lines." Order No. 3 stands to-day to the eternal disgrace of the American nation.

Yet, in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, a gentleman of high college attainments stands up here and says that the negroes are deserving of no credit, because they have not been upon the field at certain times which he has mentioned. Now, sir, no man who understands the history of this war, and is willing to do justice and to tell the truth about the negroes, will say they have not been present at every time and under all circumstances to defend the flag and to suppress treason and put down traitors when they have had the opportunity and been allowed to do so.

I might read a word here in justification of what I have said. I say my colleague [Mr. KASSON] does not represent the people of the State of Iowa. Let me read a few words from a paper of that State, a copy of which I have received to-day. I will not read the whole of it, because it contains some harder things than I have ever dared to say on this floor about him or any other man. I will simply read this much of it:

"The people of Iowa do not indorse Mr. KASSON's idea of reconstruction, but propose to lay him on the shelf. His ideas will not be supported by a corporal's guard in the Iowa Legislature."

Now, sir, I have the right to read that language when my colleague stands up here and tells you so, that it may go out to the country, that he has been indorsed by the Iowa Legislature.

I have read from a most respectable paper published in the State of Iowa, the second probably to only one paper in the State in circulation; but when the gentleman makes the issue he must take the consequences. If I have not made the point clear that the fight in Iowa was on the subject of negro suffrage, and was carried by sixteen thousand majority, then I will be glad to answer any question which any gentleman present may wish to propound to me to make it as clear as possible. If no gentleman has any question to put to me I have nothing more to say, except to thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] and the House for this opportunity to set this question right, before this House and the country, as the facts have justified me in doing.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to allow me a word of reply.

Mr. PRICE. I object, unless I be allowed to reply.

Mr. JULIAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it is altogether becoming that a gentleman who has made an attack such as that to which we have just listened should protest to my friend from Indiana against allowing me a word in reply. I am in the habit, sir, of speaking yes or no when yes or no tells the truth; and I am in the habit of telling in more words what the truth is when yes or no does not do it. I commend the practice to my colleague from Iowa. Never have I answered the argument of a colleague of mine upon this floor, nor taken up a discussion with them. I have held to the maxim that "it is a dirty bird that fouls its own nest," and I commend the maxim to my colleague, and shall be encouraged in it by the people of his district.

But when he flings the gauntlet at me, when he stands up to say I provoked this issue, I deny it, and make the issue directly here and now, and appeal to the House whether I made any issue of veracity upon this floor. When he asked me, upon my yielding the floor to him, whether this subject was not in issue, I read the platform of the party on the subject. I told him what was the various county action upon the platform. I told him the result in his own county. I showed how it was in the issue by the facts in the case.

He says that he did not have anything to do with the getting up of the resolutions at the meeting at which he spoke. All I have to say is, that I have letters from citizens of his own town on my table which charge him, first, with getting up the meeting for the purpose of opposition to the President and to myself, and secondly, with writing the offensive resolutions. [Laughter.] One of the letters goes further, and says, in addition to what I have stated, that one of the members of the committee, in consequence of the indignation expressed in that town, had come out with a card, in some way apologizing for the action taken by them. Not only that; but since he has foolishly declared that my district does not indorse me, I will add that these letters from his own town declare that he could not be elected as alderman in any ward of the city of Davenport to-day. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the difference between him and me is this: he says I do not represent my district. I have shown that he came within a few votes of losing the banner county of his own State and of his own residence, because of the action which he took in his own county. He does not deny it. I do deny his charge, and challenge him to the proof that my district does not support me in the position I have taken. He says that I took the occasion to be absent from the canvass. I did go across the plains, and I do not cease to thank God for the years that it has added to my life. And I tell my colleague that I am indebted to it for the vim with which I am now enabled to nail his charges to the floor. Before I left, the Governor of that State and the chairman of the Republican State central committee desired of me, if I should not be present in the canvass, at least to issue an address. I did write an address—I hold it in my hand—which the gentleman refers to as a letter; and in that address I urged our people to hold together. I shall trouble the House with only a single sentence of it:

"Let us continue in union among ourselves, tolerant of minor differences of opinion, that national union and liberty may be confirmed by our united labors."

This address was issued to the people of my district for the purpose of resisting the efforts then made to break us in pieces. In that address I cited Mr. Lincoln's opinion, and Mr. Jefferson's opinion, and said I would go the length of both for negro suffrage—that is, qualified suffrage. I came out clearly to the extent of my influence and action in that case, by asking, as I stated hereto-day, that the word "white" should be stricken out of the constitution in order to allow qualified suffrage, for which in this address I expressly declared myself. Unless I am very much mistaken, there was no essential difference between a published letter of a Senator from my State and my own position in that canvass.

Now, sir, is it fair, in view of the treatment I have uniformly extended to my colleague, for him to raise personal issues with me in the manner that he has done? Am I entitled to be treated with such discourtesy? He alone has raised the issue. The question of negro suffrage was before the people of my State in the manner I have stated. One gentleman who has just been elected a Senator from that State declared, as I was informed, that the question was one practically to be submitted to the people, and that when it came to be submitted, he added humorously, "I shall vote just as I please."

Now, in view of these facts, I deemed it necessary to state that the issue in my State, so far as this issue was allowed, actually turned on the question of amending our constitution so that some negroes might vote, and it did not turn upon the question of allowing all negroes to vote. I am with the people on the question of qualified suffrage, which is as far as the platform goes. For it is simply to strike out the word "white," which was necessary in order to have qualified suffrage.

I trust the House will pardon me for taking up this much time in personal explanation. I would not even now use any discourtesy to the gentleman who has provoked this debate. I wish to stand simply right upon the record, touching the action of my own district and the confidence of the people in me. There is a better tribunal than the gentleman from Davenport, [Mr. PRICE,] who very nearly lost his own county, with its noble Union majorities, as he knows, in consequence of his views on this subject. And I believe when it comes to be known what the action of my State will be, that it will establish essentially the principle adopted by Massachusetts, and cement and perpetuate the institutions of this country, by making intelligence and virtue, as far as practicable, the basis of the right of suffrage among this people.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PRICE. I ask to be allowed two minutes to reply.

Mr. JULIAN. I give way.

Mr. PRICE. I can state to the House in two minutes all I have to say. I have established the fact that the question of negro suffrage was before my State in that election, and all my colleagues, except the member from the fifth district, will corroborate my statement. So much in regard to that question of veracity. The gentleman has raised another. All I have to say in reference to the writing of the resolution I will say to this House, and I will bring proof—clear, plain, positive, and overwhelming—that what I have said about that is correct, and the statement of my colleague is, as a matter of course, incorrect.

A MEMBER. Who wrote the letter?

Mr. PRICE. I know who wrote it. I venture to say that I can tell exactly what name is signed to it. A man does not live twenty-one years in a place, if he amounts to anything and is able to say yes and no, without making some enemies.

Now, in reference to the gentleman just elected to the United States Senate, I wish to read a short paragraph from a paper published in the State of Iowa within a week past:

"Governor Kirkwood's friends are, however, quite sure of his success, and may, of course, be right. Singularly enough, singular in view of the 'conservative' efforts of the last campaign, the only bone of contention between the friends of Messrs. Harlan and Kirkwood, as to principles, is as to which of their respective candidates is the most radical!"

That is the question. My colleague was in the canvass for United States Senator, but not being very radical, I think his votes could be counted by about three. I will bring the proof in regard to the resolution referred to, that it was written without any knowledge on my part—such proof as no man can call in question.

Mr. KASSON. I wish simply to say that I was not in the senatorial canvass; and that again the gentleman's habit of saying yes or no leads to a very incorrect statement, and leads me to commend again to him the propriety of knowing the facts before he undertakes to state them. A letter of mine, dated before the Legislature met for the canvass, was written to the members of the delegation from my own county, positively refusing the use of my name for either the short or the long term. That letter the gentleman of course did not seem to be aware of, although I am told the papers had announced my declination. It is true that at one time I was a candidate, but after reflection I withdrew my name absolutely.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor.

TEST OATH FOR ATTORNEYS AT LAW.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the test oath so far as relates to attorneys at law.

Mr. HILL. With the consent of my colleague [Mr. JULIAN] I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at thirty-five minutes past three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. HARRIS. I observe by the reading of the Journal that the papers in the case of Jane W. Nethaway were referred to the Committee on Claims. I intended to move that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions. That is the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, and the reference to the Committee on Pensions will be ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of Commodore T. Turner, United States Navy, praying that an act may be passed granting him a distributive share of the prize money arising from the captures of the steamers Aries, Cherokee, and St. John, by the blockading squadron off Charleston harbor commanded by him; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Rear Admiral David D. Porter, United States Navy, praying that his mother, Mrs. Eveline Porter, be granted a pension of sixty dollars a month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Jerome B. Pillow, who represents that he is a loyal citizen of the United States, and that a quantity of cotton belonging to him was seized and appropriated by the officer in command of the United States forces at Helena, Arkansas, on or about the 12th of July, 1862; for which loss he prays that compensation may be granted to him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying for an increase of the pay of officers of the United States Navy, together with a report of a special committee of the Chamber of Commerce which was appointed to make investigations on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, in which they ask Congress to declare null and void all laws and parts of laws which make disqualifications and distinctions on account of color. It will be observed that this petition is broader than a petition merely asking for suffrage for colored persons; it asks that all laws that make any distinction on account of color shall be abolished. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of citizens of Saginaw county, Michigan, remonstrating against the renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who have lost legs or arms, or both, in the United States service during the late war for the Union, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 22) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the memorials and other papers relating to the improvement of the harbor of Frankfort, on Lake Michigan, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Josephine Rice, widow of the late Brigadier General James C. Rice, praying for a pension, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of J. W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh United States infantry, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to credit him for payments of bounty to enlisted men, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COWAN. Some days ago I had referred to the Committee on Claims the petition and accompanying papers of Henry S. Davis, praying for compensation for fitting up the west wing of the Patent Office. I now ask leave to withdraw the petition and papers from that committee.

Leave was granted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 67) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, and the amendment reported yesterday to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute, have directed me to report the bill back to the Senate with some slight amendments to the amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to adopt this amendment now as thus amended, as a substitute for the original bill, with a view to have it printed as a whole. The committee are unanimous in favor of the amendment as a substitute for the original bill, and I do not think there will be any difference of opinion about that. The original bill was printed, and I should like to have the bill as perfected printed, so that we can have it before us tomorrow.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that there would be any objection to that unless it be that by adopting that as an amendment now the Senate will preclude itself from amending that amendment in the future.

Mr. WILSON. They will not do that.

Mr. GRIMES. My inquiry is this: if the substitute be adopted as an amendment now, will not the Senate be precluded from amending that amendment whenever the bill shall be printed as the Senator desires and come up for the action of the Senate? If the Senator will simply report his amendment as a substitute, and have the entire bill printed, and then let us pass on it, doubtless it will be satisfactory to us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill would be amendable in the Senate, but it might embarrass the action of the Senate in Committee of the Whole if the amendment was now substituted for the original bill.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to printing it in the way suggested by the Senator from Iowa, but I thought it would save time to adopt the course I proposed. I consent, however, to the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the substitute reported by him in lieu of the bill recommitted to the committee be printed, with the amendments reported, as an original bill. If there be no objection, the order to print will be so entered.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I give notice that tomorrow, or at some future day, I shall present the British foreign enlistment act, with a clause repealing all existing neutrality laws.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 78) to establish certain post roads in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now ask leave to introduce the joint resolution which I offered yesterday.

Leave was granted, and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) declaring non-intercourse between the United States and the Government of Great Britain, on account of the refusal of that Government to make reparation for damages inflicted on our commerce by her subjects, was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understood the resolution as read yesterday. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; it is a resolution declaring non-intercourse.

Mr. JOHNSON. As it is very important that the decision of the Senate should be known at once—the mere offering of the resolution is calculated to awaken great solicitude—I move to lay it upon the table, and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADE. That motion is not debatable, but I hope the resolution will not be laid on the table. I hope it will take the usual course, and be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That, I think, is the best way to dispose of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the very thing I wish to avoid, not that I have any doubt as to the patriotism or good sense of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but because I think it is exceedingly desirable that the question should be disposed of at once; and, as I rather suppose the Senate are prepared now to decide whether a resolution like this shall pass, I persist in my motion to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable. The Senator from Maryland asks that the question on that motion be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I inquire of the Chair whether it will not be perfectly competent for any Senator to move to take up that resolution at any time if it shall now be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so competent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope it will be referred. If laid on the table, it may be called up any day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to inquire if the Senator from Michigan wishes to address the Senate on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not. I simply wish to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I shall vote to lay it on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. If it was in order I should like to appeal to my friend from Maryland to allow the resolution to take the ordinary course, and be referred to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to oblige the honorable Senator, but I cannot consent to that course.

Mr. WADE. I will barely say that if it lies on the table, it will not lie quietly there a great while.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Sanlshury, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—25.
NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wade—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Wright, and Yates—12.

So it was ordered that the joint resolution lie on the table.

MILITARY TRIAL OF DAVIS AND CLAY.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg now to present the joint resolution of which I gave notice yesterday.

The Secretary read twice by its title a joint resolution in relation to the trial of Jefferson Davis and Clement C. Clay.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution at length.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not propose to take up the resolution for consideration at this time, but I ask for an order that it be printed, and that in the mean time it lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to make a suggestion to my friend. I ask him whether his resolution should not be a concurrent resolution rather than a joint resolution? As I understand it, it is in the nature of a call on the President.

Mr. HOWARD. It is simply a recommendation to him.

Mr. SUMNER. That, I presume, is within the competence of the two Houses of Congress to make by a concurrent resolution. A joint resolution, as the Senator is aware, becomes an act of legislation which must be signed by the President. I would suggest, therefore, to my friend to make a change in the initiatory words, so as to read, "resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring."

Mr. HOWARD. I will thank the Clerk to make that alteration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That alteration will be made.

Mr. COWAN. As I heard the proposition read, it is to try these persons by "a commission." I suggest the propriety of inserting "military" before "commission."

Mr. HOWARD. That is the language of the resolution.

Mr. COWAN. "Military commission?"

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know that there is any law for civil commissions.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall not discuss the question with the learned Senator from Pennsylvania whether it is competent to issue a civil commission. I move that the resolution be printed, and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the resolution of the Senate authorizing the joint committee, appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States, to send for persons and papers.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) granting certain public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of Iowa; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

COURTS IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate any correspondence which may have taken place between himself and any of the judges of the Supreme Court touching the holding of the civil courts of the United States in the insurrectionary States for the trial of crimes against the United States.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate the regular numbers of copies of the Dictionary of Congress, as revised and brought down to date, and that the same copyright be paid the compiler that was paid to him by a resolution of this body, adopted June 20, 1864.

BREAKWATER IN LAKE SUPERIOR.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at the head of Lake Superior, at or near Du Luth, Minnesota; and to report by bill or otherwise.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of all documents, papers, and maps on file in his Department, relating to the branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City, Iowa.

PRINTING OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War, communicating copies of the records and proceedings of the military commission in relation to the trial and conviction of E. W. Andrews of South Carolina, J. M. Brown and C. C. Reese of Georgia, J. L. McMillan and Neill McGill of North Carolina, be printed.

NATIONAL MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill in regard to the Military Asylum which was under consideration yesterday evening; the Senator from Iowa has an amendment which can be disposed of in a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 54) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States."

Mr. GRIMES. I offer as a new section, to come in before the last section of the bill, the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to which this is amendatory as provides for the establishment of a naval in connection with a military asylum, and so much of said act as provides that all stoppages or fines adjudged against naval officers and seamen by sentence of courts-martial or military commission, all forfeitures on account of desertion from the naval service, and all moneys due to deceased naval officers and seamen which are or may be unclaimed for three years after the death of such officer or seaman, shall be appropriated for the establishment of the asylum or asylums contemplated and provided for by this act and the act of which this is amendatory, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

POST ROADS.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to establish additional post roads in Massachusetts, Oregon, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Ohio, and West Virginia.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate proposed to amend the bill by adding the following:

MICHIGAN.

From Coopersville to Squire's Ferry.

MINNESOTA.

From Hastings, via Cannon Falls, to Kenyon.
From Saint Cloud to Fort Ripley on the west bank of the Mississippi river.

From Watertown to Glencoe.

From Blue Earth City, Minnesota, to Yankton, Dakota Territory.

From Hutchinson, via Cedar, Greenleaf, Kandigoli, and Irving, to Torah.

From Henderson, by Arlington, New Auburn, Witsadan Lake, and Fort Wadsworth, in Dakota Territory, to Fort Rice on Missouri river.

DAKOTA.

From Fort Wadsworth to Devil's Lake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I offer another amendment to be added to the bill.

IOWA.

From Boonsboro to Panora.
From Winterset, via Quincy, Clarinda, and Marysville, to Savannah in Missouri.

From Indianola, via Lawrenceburg and Liberty Center, to Chariton.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I offer the following amendment:

MAINE.

From Woodman's station, via New Gloucester and West Gloucester, to North Raymond in Cumberland county.

From Poland to West Poland, in Androscoggin county.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following amendment:

CALIFORNIA.

From Rio Vista, via Maine Prairie and Binghamton, to Silvestre.

From Red Bluff, via the Upper Sacramento river, Soda Springs, and Shasta valley, to Yreka.

From Red Bluff, via Payne's creek, Mill creek, and Big Meadows, to Susanville.

From Chico, via Stony creek and Coast Range, to Nome-Cult.

From Cloverdale, via the Lakeport and Cloverdale wagon road, to Lakeport.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution to refer to the joint committee upon the condition of the States lately in rebellion certain matters.

Mr. GUTHRIE. What is that resolution? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is indorsed "a resolution, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY, to refer all papers relating to the condition and title to representation of the so-called confederate States to the joint committee upon that subject."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does that resolution come up at this time in its order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the question then be on the passage of the resolution or its reference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be open to a motion to refer or to debate when it comes up, if the Senate shall vote to take it up. It is not yet taken up. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution the title of which has just been read?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to have the resolution read in full.

The Secretary read, as follows, the resolution submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 19th of December last:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, all papers presented to the Senate relating to the condition and title to representation of the so-called confederate States shall be referred to the joint committee upon that subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the author of that resolution whether it is understood to include the credentials of persons presenting themselves for admission to this body?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly not. I think that would be an unconstitutional proceeding.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I so stated when the joint resolution for the appointment of this committee was under consideration, and it was amended, on my motion, to avoid the possibility of such a construction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is now before the Senate, and the question is on its adoption.

Mr. McDUGALL. The language of the resolution certainly covers the case of credentials. It says "all papers" and the credentials of Senators are certainly papers presented to the Senate. Those credentials will necessarily have to go to this joint committee under this resolution, if we can send them there by a resolution. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, that we have not the power to do it. The Senate must determine for itself the question as to the seats of its own members, and the House of Representatives as to the seats of persons claiming to be members of that body. But why not retain before the committee of the Senate, that must report upon the qualification of members, all the papers in these cases, so that we may have them in our own power? I take it that if these papers are referred to the joint committee of the two Houses, they cease to be within the power of the Senate—the very papers which will have to guide us in our action in determining the rights of persons claiming the seats of Senators. The language of this resolution certainly covers the whole question; it covers all the papers—credentials as well as everything else. If the Senator will make that exception in terms it may, perhaps, avoid the difficulty.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator might as well ask that a revenue bill should be referred to this committee because the States lately in rebellion will be affected by it, or that the bill which the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] has introduced to reorganize the judiciary should be referred to this committee, because that will also affect the States lately in rebellion. All our legislation affects those States as well as the loyal States, and I do not see by what construction you can claim that the credentials of persons appearing here and claiming to be Senators shall be referred to this joint committee under this resolution any more than you can claim that any other measure affecting those States shall be referred to it. Every general law must affect those States. I agree clearly with the Senator from California, and I believe there is hardly any difference of opinion on that subject, that it would not be constitutional to refer to any committee other than a committee of the Senate the credentials of persons appearing here and claiming seats in this body; but I can see no more reason for making a special exception in that case than for making a special exception in the case of any general law.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to have the Senator answer me these questions: first, are not the credentials sent here, of parties claiming seats on this floor, "papers?"

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. McDUGALL. Do not those credentials or papers relate to the rights of the persons claiming seats on this floor?

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. McDUGALL. Then, if they be papers relating to the rights of persons claiming seats upon this floor, they are within the exact terms of the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. As I am a Yankee, I will take the liberty of answering the questions of the Senator from California in the way in which the people of our country are said to answer them. I will ask him, if a petition for an increase or diminution of duties is not a "paper?" I will ask him if that paper does not refer to the States lately in rebellion; and if it does refer to the States lately in rebellion, does it not come within the strict language of this resolution?

Mr. McDUGALL. No; this resolution relates to the rights of persons claiming seats on this floor, in exact terms.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then when the Senator from California will tell me how the papers to which I have just referred do not come within the strict language of the resolution, I shall be able to tell him how the credentials of persons claiming seats here do not come within the strict language of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK. The Senate will mark the language of this resolution, I think. It is that these papers, "until otherwise ordered," shall go to that committee. Now, it will be perfectly competent, when any credentials or any other papers are presented, for the Senator presenting them to move that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if the Senate so order they will go there. This resolution only directs where they shall go until the Senate takes some definite action in regard to the papers. It is only a general way of disposing of business.

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. This is a joint committee of the two Houses; and after they have been referred to this joint committee, will they be within the power of the Senate until the joint committee choose to report either to this House or the other?

Mr. CLARK. That is a question which it is not necessary for me to answer for the elucidation of this subject, because the Senate will have the control of the papers before they go to the joint committee, and it is not the understanding of any Senators around me, so far as I know, that this resolution embraces credentials, or is designed to embrace credentials. The general impression is that they should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. This resolution is only to provide a method of disposing of the business before the Senate without obstructing the Senate; and if any Senator wants any paper which he presents to go in a different direction, it will be perfectly competent for him to make such a motion, and for the Senate to order it in that direction, notwithstanding this resolution. The language of the resolution is, "until otherwise ordered by the Senate."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There seems to be, on the part of the mover of this resolution, a distinct understanding that it does not cover credentials, and he says it would be unconstitutional to refer the credentials of members of this body to a joint committee of the two Houses; but on the other side it is objected that the words, as they stand, cover credentials, because the language is, "all papers" relating to the title to representation. I think it says "all papers." I ask the Secretary to read the resolution.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, all papers presented to the Senate relating to the condition and title to representation of the so-called confederate States shall be referred to the joint committee upon that subject.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now, Mr. President, those words, "all papers," certainly cover the certificates—

Mr. GRIMES. The title of the State to be represented; not the title of a man to the office.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The certificate of their being chosen, coming here, or purporting to come here, under the seal of the State, is certainly a paper in relation to the right of the State to representation in this body. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "except credentials." That will avoid any ambiguity about it.

Mr. HOWE. It does seem to me that we are more frightened about this resolution than there is any occasion for being. Whatever the words of the resolution may mean, they are certainly entirely harmless. The resolution is always within the control of the Senate, as has been justly suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. Whenever any paper which is supposed to come within the purview of the resolution is presented to the Senate, any Senator can raise the question upon its reference to this particular committee. But inasmuch as this committee has been raised for some purpose, it seems to me a very proper thing to take some action as to the general class of subjects that shall be referred to the committee. It is raised for some purpose, and it ought to have something to do. This resolution seems to me to be very proper to guide the action of the Senate upon the general class of questions which are to be referred to it. That is the purpose of the resolution, as I understand it.

Now, as to the question of construction which is raised here, whether the language of this resolution covers credentials or not, it does not seem to me that any two Senators need to differ at all. Credentials which are issued by a political body having the authority to send Senators here bear upon the right of those individuals to seats here. This resolution provides only that papers relating to the rights of the constituent body to send Senators here shall be referred to this joint committee. One is the evidence of the right of individuals to represent a constituency, but the papers which this resolution refers to, and which are to go to the joint committee, are papers which bear upon the right of the constituency to be represented here. The distinction is very apparent.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I believe the time fixed for the consideration of the special order has arrived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the adjournment of the Senate yesterday, and he is under the impression that no special order was made. If there was a special order made, the Chair will be corrected by the Journal. The Chair understands that the bill to which the Senator from Kentucky refers was postponed until to-day at one o'clock, but not made a special order. Perhaps it was the understanding of the Senate that the bill should then be taken up, but there was no motion made to make it a special order.

Mr. DAVIS. The understanding of the Senate was that it should be taken up at one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that such was the impression of the Senate, although the bill was not made a special order.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that the vote be taken on this subject now. I have said all that I intended to say, except this: while I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, that this resolution does not cover the case of credentials, I do not agree with the constitutional principle which is asserted here on every hand, that it would not be competent for the Senate to refer credentials either to this joint committee or to the common council of the city of Washington, or make any other reference of them they choose. There is nothing in the Constitution against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the bill that was set for to-day at one o'clock be now taken up.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall have a vote on this resolution. I fancy that the debate upon it is over. ["Oh, no."] If it is not, we may as well have it now as any other time. I should like to have the resolution disposed of. I do not wish to press it against the wishes of any Senator who may desire to address the Senate upon it, but I should like to make some progress in its consideration to-day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps the amendment that I have proposed may bring this matter to an end. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow us to dispose of this resolution—

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the honorable Senator will not insist on continuing the debate. The question is not going to be taken now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate postpone the present and all other orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUFFRAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the Senator from Kentucky addresses the Senate, I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, in order that we may have the whole subject before the Senate. In the seventh line of the first section of the amendment, after the word "States," I move to insert the words, "and excepting persons who may have voluntarily left the District of Columbia to give aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the bill just read is properly and in its order before the Senate. On yesterday morning it and all the other orders were set aside by the request of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] to take up a bill upon which he desired to express his views. This was done in conformity to the usual courtesy of the Senate, and most properly; and that Senator proceeded to deliver a long and able speech on that measure.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] was present while all this was being done, and intervened no objection. When the Senator from Vermont had concluded his argument, and it was not then proposed to proceed further with that subject, the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] by my desire, moved to set aside all other pending orders, and to assign the bill now before the Senate for one o'clock to-day; and I requested, as a matter of courtesy personal to myself, that the Senate would make that order. The Senator from Massachusetts objected, and in such manner as to imply that my appeal to the courtesy of the Senate was not intended to comprehend him; and in this he was certainly correct. There is no member of the Senate who so often asks, or presumes, upon its courtesy as he; and there is none so little disposed to extend it to other Senators, whether if he asked or unasked by them. On objecting to my request, he inquired of me if the speech which I desired to make could not be made on another bill that had been proposed to be taken up; and upon my expressing a negative, he had the assurance to refer to still another bill, and to ask me if my speech could not as well be made on one of them as the measure now under consideration.

I was not surprised by the conduct of that Senator, and do not now complain of it or feel aggrieved by it. I know that he could not avoid it; that with him such conduct is inevitable. I never ask a courtesy at the hands of that Senator.

But to the Senator from Maine, for making the motion at my instance, to the Senator from Illinois, for withdrawing his objection, and to the Senate for allowing it, I do make my respectful acknowledgments.

Mr. President, Congress is empowered by the Constitution to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever in the District of Columbia. The object of that provision was to withdraw the seat of the Government of the United States from State jurisdiction, and to place it under the control of the General Government, to prevent any exercise of power that would molest the persons administering that Government, or interfere with them in the performance of their duties. It was more to protect the Government itself than to give it jurisdiction over the people of the District. The men who devised that arrangement were too wise and practical to have intended that the Senators and Representatives of the aggregated States should undertake by their legislation to regulate all the local affairs of this people. Such a duty can be much more conveniently and wisely performed by every people, acting by representatives which they themselves choose; and it is their natural right, too, to govern themselves by such an agency.

The members of the Convention, organizing their system on the principle that all legitimate government is founded on the consent of the governed, did not intend to ignore that principle as to this District. Their purpose was that its people should make their own laws and govern themselves; and that Congress should exercise a supervisory legislative power, and control their legislation only when it should be necessary to protect the Federal Government and its personnel from the action of the District authorities.

It seems to me, then, that the proper system for this District would be for Congress to organize a government analogous to the territorial governments, constituting a legislative body consisting of two Houses, and an executive officer and courts, to be chosen periodically by such of its people as are now authorized to vote in its elections; and they also to elect, every two years, a Delegate to Congress to represent the interests of the District to that body. The laws passed by its Legislature to take effect from the times therein respectively named, to be submitted to the next ensuing Congress, and to continue in operation until disapproved by it, or repealed by the Legislative Assembly of the District.

The measure under consideration proposes to confer the elective franchise on every male negro of twenty-one years of age, who has resided six months in the District, and who shall be able to read the Constitution of the United States in the English language, and write his name. The reading and writing will be found practically to be no qualification, for soon, about all will be able to spell, if not to read through the Constitution, and to scrawl their names, or at any rate to prove their ability to do both by some American citizen of African descent. And how much more capable will the colored citizen be to take part in the trivial matter of government, after having made such amazing attainments, than he was before?

The right to vote is not a natural, but an artificial right, as well in our country as all others wherever it has been exercised; and in the countries where it has been most diffused it never was allowed to one fourth of the people, the women and minors and many other small classes not being permitted to vote under the most popular Governments. From our systems the negro has been always shut out, except in a few localities; and in a majority of them for a short period only was this mischievous anomaly tolerated. It is probably no exaggeration to say, that from the beginning 50,000 individual negroes, in the aggregate, have not exercised the right of suffrage in the United States. This District and the adjoining States have been settled by the white man, and under his popular government for more than two hundred years, and during that period they have had dwelling within them, free negroes, and never have they been suffered to vote. Why this late and strange innovation? By the tables of the census of 1860, the white population of this District was 30,687; the free negro population, 8,361; and the slave population, 4,694; making a total negro population of 13,055; a very small fraction under one fourth of the aggregate population of the District. What new light has burst upon the world and upon the Senate to disclose the necessity, or the great usefulness, of the negroes of this District exercising the right of suffrage in its elections? Is it necessary to bring back the rebel States to their true loyalty? Cannot the Union be restored to harmony and peace and fraternity without it? Cannot the men charged with the administration of public affairs in this District, proceed with sufficient security and quietude in the performance of their duties unless they are hedged around by negro votes? Does some great national object or policy require this enlargement of popular sovereignty at the capital?

How many States allow negro suffrage? Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, and New York. All the others forbid it; and, notwithstanding the extreme acme to which the negro mania has risen in the free States since the rebellion broke out, Connecticut, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nevada, and Colorado have voted against negro suffrage. The States that have passed upon the question, except Iowa, have voted it down by their white people, with light majorities it is true, except Colorado; and if the white race of those States respectively, by meager majorities, can vote down negro suffrage in them, why should not the white race of this District, voting about two hundred to one, exercise a similar right? Is it because in Connecticut there are but 8,627 negroes to 451,520 whites; in Wisconsin 1,171 negroes to 774,710 whites; in Minnesota 259 negroes to 173,596 whites; while in this District one fourth of the whole population are negroes? Of the States which allow negro suffrage, Vermont has 709 negroes and 314,380 whites; Rhode Island has 3,952 negroes and 170,668 whites; Massachusetts has 9,602 negroes and 1,221,464 whites; and New York has 49,005 negroes and 3,831,730 whites, and requires each negro to own real estate of the value of $250 to qualify him to vote. A healthy man may take into his stomach one, or two, or three drops of arsenic without serious detriment to his health; but if he were to swallow one, two, or three hundred drops it would destroy his life. Negro suffrage is political arsenic. If it is not, why do not the free States open wide their throats and gulp down the grateful and invigorating draught? Why does not California give the right of suffrage to her Chinamen; Michigan and many other States to their Indians; and Pennsylvania to her Gypsy gangs, that are perpetually vibrating between her plains and mountains?

Why do not the free States adopt the general average principle, and take their pro rata of the whole negro population? That proposition was made to them a few years since by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] but they all voted against it. They have too much sense for that. At this time more of those States might be willing to confer suffrage on their own free negroes, but it would be the hoisting of "false colors." They know there would be no further accessions of that population to them from immigration; and they would expect to be compensated, "some thirty, some forty, some sixty, and some an hundred-fold," in some way, for the disadvantage of their inconsiderable negro suffrage. But if the negro population run upon the white population in the free States in the same proportion as it does in this District and the southern States, in some of them being from thirty to fifty, and in South Carolina more than fifty per cent., would any of the free States, under such a condition of things, accept negro suffrage? A successful effort to force it upon them would very speedily inaugurate another rebellion.

But, Mr. President, the question whether a few thousand negroes of this District shall vote in its elections is of very trivial importance to the people of the United States, and to that portion of them who are so exercised by it, and who are making such strenuous efforts to bring it about. This contest is but an experiment, a skirmish, an entering wedge to prepare the way for a similar movement in Congress to confer the right of suffrage on all the negroes of the United States, liberated by the recent amendment of the Constitution, the power to be claimed under its second clause. It is following up the tactics of the party four years ago, when the assault upon slavery in this District heralded the general movement that was to be made against it.

Mr. President, the people of the late slave States do not intend to make any question upon the effect of the amendment in freeing their slaves; they have conceded it, finally and forever. There is probably now not a negro in the United States who is claimed by any one as property, or who does not exercise the right to control his own movements as a freeman. The first section of that amendment abolishes slavery, or involuntary servitude, one or both, except as punishment for crime, everywhere in the United States; and it does not propose to do anything more. The second section confers on Congress only the power to pass such laws as may be appropriate to give effect to the first. A negro may be a slave, and he may be emancipated by the special act of his owner, or by a general legislative enactment of the government of the State in which he resides. The slavery of a great number has been abolished in both forms, and neither the right to vote, or to give evidence in court, or to serve on juries, has ever accompanied either form of manumission. Slavery is the subjection of one person to another by authority of law, and all that is necessary to destroy the slavery is, by any mode, to remove the legal subjection. To abolish slavery, to emancipate slaves, to give freedom to slaves, are frequent and familiar phrases to all the people of the United States; and the acts and the ideas imported by them are definite and well understood. To vote, to swear in court, and to try cases as a juror, are not parts of either, but as distinct from them "as a hawk is from a hand-saw." The second section of the amendment gives to Congress no pretext of power to invest the negroes freed by it with the right of suffrage, or to pass any law about the freed negro, except simply to make practical the destruction of his legal subjection to another. But if Congress were clothed by it with that power in the clearest language, it ought never to confer upon freed negroes, or any classes of them, the right of suffrage.

The tranquillity, prosperity, and freedom of a country depend much upon the homogeneity of its people; and in a popular representative Government it is especially important that the sovereign political power, that portion of the people who choose the officers of the Government, and thus control its legislation, policy, and administration, should have no fixed and essential antagonisms of race. The different branches of the great Caucasian family of Europe, if not brought together suddenly in too large numbers for a ready, harmonious, and perfect amalgamation, might form the highest order of nationality; because none of the stocks would degrade the others, and all might contribute to the common improvement. But in our country a race of people that is essentially inferior to the Caucasian race in its physical, mental, and moral structure, and that no cultivation can bring to an approximation of that high standard; that has by nature so low an organization as to be wholly incapable of self-civilization, or organizing a self-government, or maintaining a civilization and form of government which had been bestowed upon it by a superior people—a race which could take no part in the great business of Government to improve or uphold it, but only to obstruct, thwart, confound, and break it up, should never have any political power conferred on it. I hold that the negro is such a race; that he is the lowest and the Caucasian is the highest of the races of man, and the others are intermediate; and that he cannot be mingled with the blood, or in the management of the affairs of the white man without degradation and mischief to him.

The word "negro," as an ethnological term, does not comprehend all the black, much less the dusky families of man; it refers to that race which Cuvier describes as being "marked by a black complexion, crisped or wooly hair, compressed cranium, and a flat nose. The projection of the lower parts of the face and the thick lips evidently approximate it to the monkey tribe." The great naturalist might have added, as other distinctive characteristics of the negro: first, that his skin exhales perpetually a peculiar, pungent, and disagreeable odor; second, that "the hollow of his foot makes a hole in the ground."

The aboriginal home of the negro is Africa, though there are other distinct black races, of a different and higher type, that have been and are still found on that great continent, and also in Asia, from the remotest periods. Memnon and Sesostris, Hannibal and Jugurtha, the queen of Ethiopia who visited Solomon, and Cleopatra, were not negroes, though they were black or dusky. The negroes who inhabit Africa may be estimated at not less than 50,000,000, and they probably are not more numerous now than they have been for many centuries. They are spread over the larger portion of the continent, from the interior to many of its sea-coasts, and are divided into numerous small tribes, which differ in the dispositions of the people, some being fierce and cruel, and others comparatively gentle and humane. The slaves that were brought from Africa to America, were mostly of the Fantees, Ashantees, Kroomen, Quaquas, Congoes, Eboes, Fidoes, Coromantines, Mandingoes and Caffres, all tribes of the negro race.

Agassiz writes:

"In Africa we have the Hottentot and negro races in the south and central portions respectively, while the people of northern Africa are allied to their neighbors in Europe, just as we have seen to be the case with the zoological fauna in general."

Professor Soemmerring enumerates forty-six distinct differences in the anatomy of the negro from the European race, as he is referred to in Guenbault's Natural History of the Negro Race.

Lawrence, in describing the negro variety of the human race, enumerates these distinctive features:

1. Narrow and depressed forehead; the entire cranium contracted anteriorly; the cavity less, both in its circumference and transverse measurements.
2. Occipital foramen and condyles placed further back.
3. Large space for the temporal muscles.
4. Great development of the face.
5. Prominence of the jaws altogether, and particularly of their alveolar margins and teeth; consequent obliquity of the facial line.
6. Superior incisors slanting.
7. Chin receding.
8. Very large and strong zygomatic arch, projecting toward the front.
9. Large nasal cavity.
10. Small and flattened osssa nasi; sometimes consolidated and running into a point above. In all the particulars just enumerated, the negro structure unequivocally approximates to that of the monkey. It not only differs from the Caucasian model, but is distinguished from it in two respects: the intellectual characters are reduced; the animal features enlarged and exaggerated. "The inferiority of organization is attended with corresponding inferiority of faculties, which may be improved, not so much by the unfortunate beings who are degraded by slavery, as by every fact in the past history and present condition of Africa."

Nott & Gliddon, in their work entitled Types of Mankind, say:

"A man must be blind not to be struck by similitudes between some of the lower races of mankind, viewed as a connecting link in the animal kingdom; nor can it be rationally affirmed that the orang-outang and chimpanzee are more widely separated from certain African and Oceanic negroes, than are the latter from the Teutonic and Pelagian types."

Dr. Wyman, of Harvard University, specifies the differences between the negro and the orang-outang, and adds:

"Yet it cannot be denied, however wide the separation, that the negro and the orang-outang do afford the points where man and the brute, when the totality of their organization is considered, most nearly approach each other."

Charles White, a naturalist, of Birmingham, sixty years since, published a work in which he pointed out twenty-eight distinct differences between the African negro and the European, in all of which the former approached the brute creation. Copeland, Chambers, Dr. Moseley, White, Dr. Prichard, Smith, and Vrolioh, of Amsterdam, name many distinctions between the white and the negro race, besides the black skin and the coarse crisped hair of the latter; among them are the arch of the leg and the want of it in the foot, the receding heel, the dome of the head, the perpendicularity of the vertebral column, a different formation of pelvis, low nervous irritability, and others, all of which mark their approach toward the lower form of animals.

Camper, Soemmerring, Lawrence, Virey, Ebel, and Blumenbach agree that the brain of the negro is smaller; and Gall, Spurzheim, and Combe, that it is so distributed as to denote less capacity for reasoning and judging than the Caucasian.

No well-informed and candid person can doubt the mental inferiority of the negro race. Lawrence says, "the mind of the negro is inferior to that of the European, and his organization is less perfect. These positions," he says, "are supported not so much by the unfortunate beings who are degraded by slavery, as by every fact in the past history and present condition of Africa."

Charles Hamilton Smith, who resided ten years on the coast of Africa and in the West Indies, and who had the best opportunities to observe the negro, and whose sympathies he declares to have been with him, says:

"The typical woolly-haired races have never invented a reasonable theological system, discovered an alphabet, formed a grammatical language, nor made the least step in science or art."

F. Pulszky, in his Iconographic Researches, writes of the black races:

"Long as history has made mention of negroes, they have never had any art of their own. Their features are recorded by their ancient enemies, not by themselves."

Hume, in his Essay on National Characters, argues in support of the superiority of the white over every other race, and attributes to it "all civilization," adding:

"There are negro slaves dispersed all over Europe, of which none ever discovered any symptoms of ingenuity."

The Natural History of the Human Species, its Typical Forms, &c., published in Edinburgh, says:

"In no part of this extended region [negro Africa] is there an alphabet, a hieroglyphic, or even a picture or symbol of any description."

Knox, in his Lectures on the Races of Man, declares:

"The grand qualities which distinguish the man from the animal, the generalizing powers of pure reason, the love of perfectibility, the desire to know the unknown, and last and greatest, the ability to observe new phenomena and new relations; these mental functions are deficient, or seem to be, in all dark races. But if it be so, how can they become civilized? What hopes for their progress?"

These questions are thus answered, casually, but most pertinently, by a French traveler in the West Indies, Cassaynac:

"The friends of useful and moral liberty should strive to maintain the supremacy of the white race until the black race understands, loves, and practices the duties and obligations of civilized life."

Carlisle thus addresses himself to the emancipated negroes of the West Indies:

"You are not slaves now, nor do I wish, if it can be avoided, to see you slaves again; but decidedly you will have to be servants to those who are born wiser than you, that are born lords of you—servants to the whites if they are (as what mortal man can doubt they are?) born wiser than you. That, you may depend on it, my obscure black friends, is and was always the law of the world, for you and for all men to be servants, the more foolish of us to the more wise. Heaven's laws are not repealable by earth, however earth may try."

Paulding, in his Treatise on Slavery in the United States, speaking of amalgamation, denounces it as "a scheme for lowering the standard of our nature, by approximating the highest grade of human beings to the lowest." "We have a right to conclude from all history and experience that there is an equal disparity of mental organization." "The experience of years stands arrayed against the principle of equality between the white man and the black." "All that the black man has ever done is to approach to the lowest scale of intellectual eminence, and the world has demonstrated its settled opinion of his inferiority by pronouncing even this a wonder."

In a letter from Dr. Morton, another learned and impartial northern man, there is this passage:

"It makes little difference whether the mental inferiority of the negro, the Samoyede, or the Indian, is natural or acquired; for if ever they possessed equal intelligence with the Caucasian they have lost it, and if they never had it they had nothing to lose. One party would arraign Providence for creating them originally different, another for placing them in circumstances by which they became inevitably so. Let us find out the truth, and reconcile it afterward."

The testimony of Judge Conrad is, that—

"The negro in the North has equal, if not superior, advantages of the poor white man." "It cannot, however, be boasted that his intellectual character has been materially elevated, or his moral nature greatly improved."

George H. Calvert's Scenes and Thoughts in Europe teaches that—

"At one end of the human scale is the black man, at the other the white; between them the brown and the yellow. The white man never comes into contact and conflict with the others that he does not conquer them."

The French philanthropist, Pynode, concludes:

"We no longer consider negroes as devoted to the hatred of God, but we hold them, generally, almost universally, as our inferiors by their own nature."

Levasseur, another French writer on this theme, premises:

"In times past, as now, it seems that the negro race, if left to themselves, cannot arrive at civilization."

Even Prichard, one of the few writers on the natural history of man who does not frankly concede the inferiority of the negro race, admits that—

"By the animality or degradation of the forms of the pelvis, peculiar to the negress and the Bushman and the Hottentot, is implied an approach toward the forms of the chimpanzee and the orang-outang."

Gibbon, in reference to the absence of continued, sustained, and persevering efforts of the negro race for its own improvement, observes:

"The inaction of the negroes does not seem to be the effect either of their virtue or of their pusillanimity. They indulge, like the rest of mankind, their passions and their appetites, and the adjacent tribes are engaged in frequent acts of hostility. But their rude ignorance has never invented any effectual weapons; they appear incapable of forming any extensive plan of government or conquest, and the obvious inferiority of their mental faculties has been discovered and abused by their neighbors of the temperate zone."

Puffendorf asserts it to be a law of nature that when the negro

"Has the fortune to live in subjection to a wise director, he is, without doubt, fixed in such a state of life as is most agreeable to his genius and capacity."

Mr. Jefferson's passionate denunciation of slavery has been often and exultingly quoted by its opponents; yet this is his testimony as to the capability of the negro race:

"Never yet could I find that a black had uttered a thought above the level of a plain narration; never saw even an elementary trait of painting and sculpture."

Theodore Parker, as quoted by Nott, in his work, Types of Mankind, declares that—

"The Caucasian differs from all other races. He is humane, he is civilized, he progresses. It is intellect, after all, that conquers, not the strength of man's arm. The Caucasian has often been the master of other races, never their slave. Republics are Caucasian. All the great sciences are of Caucasian origin. All inventions are Caucasian. Literature and romance come from the same stock."

Mr. President I could array many other authorities, European and American, to the same effect, but it would be a superfluous work. There has been brought to the attention of the Senate enough of this sort of evidence. But there is other testimony of a different nature, and of such volume and weight that it will compel all men of common understanding, and accessible to truth, to accept the proposition that the negro is inferior to the white race. We have spread before us the authentic history of the negro on the continent of America in the United States; and his life and history here, for more than three hundred years, bear plainly and conclusively upon that question. The actual observation and experience of a vast number of intelligent, living people, demonstrate to them, and through them to the world, the proposition that the white race is superior to the negro to be immutably true.

The first authentic history of negro slavery in Europe, in modern times, dates in 1442, when some Moorish prisoners to Portugal purchased their freedom by giving a ransom of negro slaves. In 1503, while the great discoverer, Columbus, was viceroy of Hispaniola, afterward named San Domingo, the first cargo of African slaves ever brought to the New World were landed in that island. So soon as the Spaniards had formed a settlement, and as they continued to form them, on islands and mainland, they enslaved the native Indian, and compelled him to the severest labor in the mines and the fields. The Indian was of a fragile and sensitive organization, and nothing could mitigate his fixed aversion to labor. The consequence was that the destruction of Indian life in Spanish slavery became frightful.

The chroniclers and historians of that day inform us that San Domingo when it was discovered had an Indian population of about 2,000,000. It is hard to believe that any area of country, not a great deal larger, could have sustained such a teeming population of savages; but the soil of San Domingo was of extraordinary fertility, its fruits and vegetables abounding, spontaneous, and perennial, and its climate mild and salubrious. We are told by the same authority that in 1495 an army of 100,000 natives was assembled by one of their chiefs to drive the Spaniards from the island, and that Columbus, with less than 300 Spanish soldiers, struck that host of savages, and with the force of a tropical tornado swept it before him. Within fifty years from the discovery of the island its Indian population was reduced below 20,000. It was to save the aboriginal race from the weight of a servitude they had not the strength to endure, and from apparent speedy annihilation, that the monk, Las Casas, procured the Spanish Government to order the importation of the African negro into all its American colonies for the purposes of labor. His constitution was found to be well adapted to the tropical climate and the labor of its cotton and sugar fields under a vertical sun. He had strength and endurance, was docile and imitative, submitted readily to the large tasks imposed upon him, and soon learned to perform his simple labors. Instead of pining and wasting away like the Indian, the African, with the facility of his nature, accepted his new condition. He became contented and cheerful, was healthy and strong, capable and willing to perform what was exacted from him, and was the greatly preferred laborer of the tropics and the low latitudes generally. One negro was deemed to be the equivalent of four Indian slaves. The natural increase of the negro race in this slavery was very large, and it was augmented by heavy annual importations from Africa into all the European colonies of America for the three hundred years succeeding its discovery. In that period of time it has been estimated that 30,000,000 African negroes were brought from their native land to slavery in the American colonies by the ships of all maritime Europe. No imagination can compass the aggregate horrors of such a vast slave traffic!

Nowhere was the increase of negro slaves more rapid than in the island of San Domingo; nowhere the product of their labor more largely remunerative. The area of this island is a fraction under 28,000 square miles. In the latter part of the last century about two thirds of it were under the dominion of Spain, and the other third was a possession of France. Alison in his History of Europe says that before the revolution by which the negroes acquired the mastery of the island—

"In the French portion the inhabitants consisted of about 40,000 whites, 60,000 mulattoes, and 500,000 negro slaves. This French colony was immensely productive, exceeding all the British islands together. Its exports, including the Spanish portion, were £18,400,000, and its imports £10,000,000 sterling."

He adds:

"The following table contains the comparative wealth, produce, and trade of San Domingo, before 1789, and in 1832, after forty years of nominal freedom:"

	1789.	1832.
Population.....	600,000	280,000
Sugar exported, pounds.....	672,000,000	none
Coffee exported, pounds.....	86,789,000	32,000,000
Ships employed.....	1,680	1
Sailors.....	27,000	167
Exports to France.....	£6,720,000	none
Imports.....	£9,890,000	none

The mulattoes and negroes of the French portion of the island revolted in 1790, and the freedom of the slaves in this and all the French colonies was proclaimed by the National Assembly, June 3, 1793.

The same historian continues:

"By the expulsion of the French from San Domingo it has been nominally independent; but slavery has been far indeed from being abolished, and the condition of the people anything but ameliorated by the change. Nominally free, the blacks have remained really enslaved. Compelled to labor by the terrors of military discipline, for a small part of the products of the soil, they have retained the severity without the advantages of servitude. The industrious habits, the flourishing aspect of the island, have disappeared; and the inhabitants, reduced to half their former amount, and bitterly galled by their republican taskmasters, have relapsed into the indolence and inactivity of savage life."

Thus writes the great historian Alison, and since then time has thrown no illumination over this dark picture of historic truth. Who, in three quarters of a century, has done nothing toward the further development of the still dormant resources of one of the most exuberant and salubrious islands of the ocean? Nothing still further to advance its population, arts, or civilization? Who has failed to conserve the population, industry, production, commerce, wealth, and social order to which part of the island had attained under French rule? Who devastated its thousands of sugar plantations, and gave to the flames its residences of luxury and refinement, with the accompaniments of libraries and letters and the arts and all the trophies of wealth, cultivation, and taste? Who annihilated its sugar production of 672,000,000 pounds annually, and reduced its annual growth of coffee 54,000,000 pounds? Who swept from the seas its great fleets of merchantmen and tens of thousands of sailors? Who cut off wholly its $92,000,000 of exports and $60,000,000 of imports annually? Who reduced its population more than one half, and notwithstanding that population first rose in 1790 to assert by force of arms its own freedom, and this boon was assured to it by the National Assembly of 1793, amidst the frenzy that executed Louis XVI as a state criminal, and was confirmed by the overwhelming numbers of Toussaint and Dessalines, and the more fatal climate of the island, to the armies of France, who still held this population, nominally free, to real servitude, and by the bayonet forced it to the performance of grievous tasks for small remuneration? Who was it that swept industry, plenty, opulence, law, order, peace, and security from the island, and introduced in their stead passion, injustice, violence, rapine, murder, universal desolation, bloody and ferocious civil war, the abandonment of all business and industrial pursuits, the reign of all the fierce passions, and the perpetration of every revolting crime, the subversion of the entire fabric of civil society, and the relapse of the whole population into the inactivity, indolence, and stolid listlessness of savage life? Who was it but the negro that brought this manifold and terrible woe upon the fairest and richest island of the seas? And what people did he bring it upon? Not those who had enslaved him, for they generally had escaped to other lands; not upon a stranger people, but upon his own race, his own kindred, upon himself. He had driven out the white owners and had appropriated their possessions to himself, after having most wantonly despoiled them. He had been brought there by the master race when he was an ignorant, helpless savage, and but little above the brute creation. He had been made a slave, and in slavery he had learned and acquired all he knew.

As the white man's slave, instructed by and imbibing from his master, he had generally acquired much practical and useful knowledge, and in many cases had been educated to a limited extent. He thus had acquired an enlightenment and civilization to which his free ancestors, in their own country, had made no approach. The efficiency which this knowledge, this civilization, imparted to him, added to his overwhelming numbers, enabled him speedily to drive the white man from the island, and to become its sole lord and ruler. For more than sixty years it has been the theater of his efforts for self-government, of his statesmanship, of his capacity to conserve and yet further advance a civilization which had been conferred upon him by the white race. From nowhere has he been thwarted or interfered with in those efforts; on the contrary, he has been aided by residence with him, for the whole period, of many intelligent and friendly white persons, and by daily commercial intercourse with the most enlightened nations of the earth, all anxious for his greatest success. And so far from his moving onward and upward, there is too much ground for the apprehension that all the knowledge and civilization which he attained to as a slave he will lose as a freeman. Internecine, bloody, and desolating wars of the mulatto, negro, and white races of this island have continued to convulse it from 1790 for the succeeding ten years, and then between mulatto and negro to this day. The chieftains, yellow and black, have been a legion. Oge, Jeannot, Rigaud, François, Beauvais, Toussaint, Christophe, Dessalines, Clervaux, Petion, Boyer, Gomar, Richard, Souloque, and others since have been the actors in this long and terrible drama, and each one, throughout his part in all the shifting scenes, wore a sword reeking with the blood of the murdered people. The last act has come not yet, and still the movement is onward in a relapse toward that ignorance and barbarism whose black pall has hung immovable and impenetrable for unnumbered centuries over the aboriginal home of this negro race.

But, Mr. President, it is sometimes said that these horrible disorders were the natural fruits of the long slavery of the negro people, and of their delivering themselves from it by force and arms. France for some centuries had been about as much debased and oppressed as San Domingo; though in a different form. Her upheaval threw off the long-accumulating weight and scattered it with the strength and fury of a volcano. Her frenzy passed away, and with renewed energies she moved off in the further development of intellect, and in the noble achievements of a higher civilization. But while the worst Jacobinism was raging in Paris, a spark from that infernal magazine lit upon this devoted island, among an inferior race, who had no recuperative forces; and the ruin which it spread has remained irremediable and hopeless.

When the subjects of Christophe, goaded by the bloody oppressions of that negro tyrant, in 1820 rose against him and transferred the northern portion of the island to Boyer, and thus made him its sole ruler, no people ever had a more favorable opportunity to repair the ravages of war, to enter upon a new and brighter career of national progress; but the Creator of all races of men had not made the negro equal to such a work of regeneration.

When the horrors of San Domingo were presented to Europe, Bonaparte, then First Consul, exclaimed that the association calling itself "the friends of the negro," the abolitionists of that day, who devised this hideous by-play of the French Revolution, "should veil itself in black." But the abolitionists of that day, and of this day, have no remorse or shame, none of the workings of the true principles of justice and philanthropy.

The negro race has passed through the probation from slavery to freedom in other conditions, under different circumstances, and by another system. The Parliament liberated, by its own imperial act, the slaves of the British West India islands. The owners there, and everywhere, who made profit and wealth by the labor of slaves, of their own free act never did nor ever will liberate them. The preparation for this measure was the operations of half a century, in Parliament and out of Parliament, of Sharp, Clarkson, Wilberforce, and other true and noble philanthropists, for the destruction of the barbarous slave trade, and their final success in 1825. Their object for many years was limited to laws of Parliament, punishing this traffic as piracy; and as they were cheered by increasing prospects of success, they naturally enlarged it to the liberation also of the slaves in all the British colonies. In 1823 a society was formed "for the mitigation and gradual abolition of slavery throughout the British dominions." Laws were passed forbidding the use of the lash, and making other meliorations in the treatment of slaves, and requiring the children to be schooled, all looking to their ultimate freedom. At length, in 1833, Parliament passed an act liberating all slaves in the British West Indies, and appropriating £20,000,000 as compensation to their owners. It provided, also, for their apprenticeship by classes during two, four, and six years; but the negroes behaved so badly as apprentices that the planters voluntarily gave up the system, and at once conferred upon them absolute freedom. Jamaica, the largest English island, contains about 6,400 square miles, has great fertility, and the name was given to it for the abundance of its springs of the purest water. Under all the depressing influence of the long agitation to emancipate the slaves, when that measure took effect there were upon this island 15,776 whites, 293,125 blacks, and 68,527 mulattoes.

This English emancipation had the orisons of the world, and it was confidently vaunted that it would bring up the negro race to the level of the proud Caucasian, and under its regenerating influence the population, productiveness, and wealth of those islands would soon leave far behind the utmost limits they had ever previously reached. These islands continue to be English colonies, protected by the power, restrained by the guardian care, and guided by the enlightened and firm statesmanship of the imperial Government. The enfranchised negro there became "equal before the law," and the peer of the white man, his late master. They were associates in political power, and alike eligible to all the offices of the locality. In this state of freedom the natural indolence of the negro resumed its dominion over him, and he refused to labor in the fields to such an extent as to greatly decrease the productiveness and prosperity of those colonies. Jamaica, in 1809, imported to the amount of £4,068,897, and exported £3,083,234; and in 1810 she imported £4,308,337, and exported £3,303,579. During those years she was a slave colony. In 1853, twenty years after her slaves had been emancipated, her imports were £864,094, and her exports £837,276; and in 1864 her exports were £408,520, and her imports £932,316. From the period of her slavery to her freedom her imports fell off more than tenfold, and her exports nearly fourfold; and this notwithstanding her negro population had increased 48,002, her mulattoes 12,526, and there have been introduced from the East Indies tens of thousands of coolies to take the place of the freed negroes who had abandoned her fields. The white population, however, fell off 1,960. The great decay in the material prosperity of Jamaica is made more striking by the facts, that during the period between 1832 and 1847, 605 sugar and coffee plantations, containing 556,432 acres of land, and affording employment to 49,883 laborers, were entirely abandoned; and from 1848 to 1853, 573 other plantations, of 891,187 acres, were totally or partially turned to waste, and this in an island of less than 7,000 square miles. These astounding facts are verified by Carey, and a statement made by the West India Association of Glasgow, and appendant documents.

Bigelow, in his Notes on Jamaica, says:

"Shipping has deserted her ports; her magnificent plantations of sugar and coffee are running to weeds; her private dwellings are falling to decay; the comforts and luxuries which belong to industrial prosperity have been cut off, one by one, from her inhabitants; and the day is at hand when there will be no one left to represent the wealth, intelligence, and hospitality for which the Jamaica planter was once so distinguished."

But by far the worst phase of all in relation to Jamaica, is the recent murderous insurrection of her negro population. Liberty, equality of rights, an abounding, peaceful, and perfectly protected home; products of a most fertile soil, and a climate whose creative forces never sleep; all the trophies of the arts, the sciences, and letters; the dignity, influence, and power of office, position in society, wealth and fame, and religious culture, were all spread out before the negro of Jamaica, and gratuitously offered to his acceptance by the white man. And yet, after being the object of such benefactions for thirty years, and every prospect of their long continuance, he has risen upon the few resident white people to expel them from the island, or to doom them to a bloody extermination. He has added another to the thousand testimonies that he is a savage who may be tamed, but that his cruel nature cannot be eradicated, and only sleeps, and that when the occasion and the exciting causes arise he is ready to rush into the carnival of blood. There he reëacted the shocking excesses of San Domingo, giving the white race to indiscriminate slaughter—sawing in twain the bodies of the men, first violating with brutal lust and then murdering the women, severing the heads of helpless infants from their bodies, and bearing them on pikes in front of their armed bands, as the ensigns of the infernal war they were waging against the race of their benefactors. The military authorities of the island have punished by summary execution, as the newspapers inform us, from two to four thousand prominent actors in this savage and murderous outbreak; and we cannot suppose that this retributive justice, whatever its extent, was too severe.

What caused this terrible uprising of the negro population? The two races, in fearful disparity of numbers though, were living together on this island, and notwithstanding the essential and irreclaimable inferiority of the negro, in full equality of legal and political rights. But the laws of man could not change the order of creation. The negro had been daily confronted for a generation by a superiority of race which all his efforts were insufficient to equal; and at length he looked up at the white man's eminence in hopeless despair. He at first imitated, then envied, and at length hated it and its possessor. He contemplated his own vast numbers, and resolved to drive the white man, with his ineffable image of superiority, from the island or utterly to destroy him. It was the negro who made this savage and unsparing war on the white man; but if the war were mutual, or had been made by the white man, it equally proves that war between the races is inevitable, and will continue until one of them exterminates or enslaves the other, or until they are separated by inhabiting different countries. Still another solution is now contemplated, miscegenation.

But, Mr. President, there is another West India island upon which has been cast the fate of the negro, Cuba, of which I will take some notice. We all know that Cuba continues to be a Spanish slave colony. Its area is about 85,000 square miles. I will present a statement of its population and exports and imports for several different years:

	Whites.	Slaves.	Free.
1827.....	311,651	280,970	106,490
1841.....	418,291	436,495	152,838
1850.....	510,988	330,425	176,647
	Exports.	Imports.
1837.....	$20,340,607	$23,499,357
1851.....	31,341,683	32,312,430
	Total revenue.	Sent to Spain.
1853.....	$25,791,206	$13,821,430

It is thus seen how prosperous Cuba, a slave colony, has been, and how rapid the growth of that prosperity.

I have presented the case of San Domingo as a French slave colony, and as an independent negro island; Jamaica as a British colony, first slave, and then with her negroes liberated and "equal before the law;" and Cuba as always a slave colony; and the facts which I have brought forward need no argument to prove the great superiority of the slave over the free islands. This superiority of development and condition was the result of the dominating mind and energies of the white race, and is proof of the inferiority of the negro.

Another great fact to the same effect is, that the negro has been enslaved in every age of the world of which there is any memorial; and that he has been the slave of every other race, and has never been able to enslave any one of them. While many negro tribes are fierce and intractable, others have much natural docility and are especially imitative. From these latter tribes the favorite negro slaves that appear so often in history were doubtless derived. The Jews in Solomon's time, and long before, the ancient Egyptians, India, centuries before Alexander broke over its confines as a conqueror, the Assyrians, the Medes and Persians, the intellectual and polished Greeks, the conquering Roman, both under the republic and the empire, all had the negro slave, and held him as property. He was the chattel-movable, or fixed to the realty throughout the middle ages; and in modern times Portugal, Spain, France, England, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and the maritime States of Italy, and all the Americas, hunted the negro in his aboriginal and savage home, and dragged him a slave away into distant lands. In his new and strange home he soon forgot kindred and country, formed new ties, adopted simple pastimes, and became contented and happy. This easy adaptation resulted from his lower organism, made him docile and pleasant, and everywhere a favorite slave.

Wherever and whenever the negro was enslaved he became more or less educated and civilized. Among a scholarly people many, no doubt, were to some extent schooled in letters, in the elements of the lower sciences, and even in some of the fine arts. All imbibed some knowledge of the useful arts and the necessary practical information to enable them to perform the simple duties of their respective positions. Take the whole mass of the negro slaves of a country, particularly in the primitive and earlier ages, when they were appropriated so largely to household service, and it probably often had a respectable aggregate of civilization and the concomitant acquirements—quite enough to have enabled an appreciating and capable race both to conserve and perpetuate what they had mastered, and also to proceed on in an indefinite career of progress.

All the great nations of antiquity with whom negroes lived in slavery, and from whom they acquired knowledge and civilization, ran their long and eventful careers, and passed away, leaving a history behind them. The remaining fragments of their nationalities and races are accounted for; they are found among the constituent elements of the new States which rose upon the ruins of those that preceded them; but the negro slaves, as separate and distinct and insoluble almost as Jew and Gypsy, what became of them? Whether they remained with their overthrown masters, under the conquerors, or wandered back to the home of their fathers, or migrated into other countries, they perpetuated themselves not, they made and wrote no history, they left no distinctive monuments. None but an inferior race could thus have passed into oblivion, leaving "not a wreck behind."

The other races of man have sent forth from their hives into distant countries conquering armies or overrunning hordes. They planted primary colonies, some of which sent out offshoots; or the original colonists sojourned a while in a strange land, and then made a new start for a still more distant and desirable home. But not so with the negro, whether primitively barbarous or partially civilized. There is no record that he ever planted a colony, or built up a State, or formed a well-ordered Government, either in his own country or any one to which he had been carried as a slave; or made any extended conquests, or war on any grander scale than the barbarous incursions and conflicts of contiguous and petty savage tribes.

But, Mr. President, this is a subject about which we have learned, not only by history and the statements and collation of facts by others, but also from our own experience and observation. We have had slavery in our own country, until yesterday, more than two hundred years; and the old thirteen, as Colonies and States, clung to it for a longer period than a century; and if the fifteen slave States had not been coerced by military power slavery and property in man would have lingered, at least in the cotton, sugar, and rice fields of those States, for centuries. Negro slavery will still abide there, and abide there forever. The great products of the warm latitudes have become the necessities of the world. The white man will have them. They can be produced only by the labor of human hands; and in the localities where they grow and flourish the air is charged with diseases fatal to the white man, but against which the negro is protected by a natural coat of mail. The white man will not labor in those fields, but he will put the negro in them, and make him cultivate them, too.

This war drove the southern planters from their richest fields, and thousands of northern men rushed to take possession of them. How many northern men entered those fields as toiling laborers? Not one. They all sought to cultivate them with the slaves of the refugees. Individual property in the African slave may have ceased forever, but his involuntary labor, his slavery, in some form, in the fields of the South, is his destiny. The God of nature hath so ordained, and man cannot thwart it. The degradation of the negro in our country is known to and acknowledged by everybody; but his eulogists attribute it to the benighting and debasing influence of his long enslavement. Who and what was the negro when he was first brought into slavery in America? He had no written history. He had never elaborated any systems of science or discovered their simplest principles; never designed any harmonious order of architecture; never produced one of the fine arts, or invented any machinery or useful arts of the least complexity. He had neither eloquence, nor painting, nor sculpture, nor poetry, nor a reasoned theology. He had no modes of calculation, constructed no principles of music or musical instruments; had no alphabet, or characters, or hieroglyphics. He was almost without language; had but the feeble glimmerings of reason; had achieved scarcely anything since he came from the hands of his Creator, and had continued to be the lowest connecting link with the brute creation. All the other races of men were also once benighted savages; but they had been created with a higher and more perfect organism, and endowed with superior faculties and powers. More excellent in complexion, form, action, and innate grace; the nicest sensibilities; deep reflection; with long forethought; exhaustless invention, the most complex ratiocination; an active and insatiable desire for progress and perfectibility; the workings within him of a higher divinity; a readier, freer, and closer communion with nature and God, lifted him up and propelled him from his primal and ignoble ignorance and destitution to the achievements of his present civilization, which, grand and affluent as they be, are but the prelude of his vast and incomprehensible future.

But during the long period in which the other races have been moving on with their wonderful creations, almost a continent of negroes have been fixed as a fossil under the weight of the barbarism and ignorance of untold centuries, because their Creator had not endowed them with the faculties and energies to emerge from it. So He made the progenitors of our negroes, the freedmen of the United States, and they can never break away from the essential nature of their parent stock.

But I will present a picture of the negro as he now is, and as he is likely to be forever, in his country, sketched by Malte Brun:

"The slave coast of Africa consists of several petty States, which are all under the despotic sway of the King of Dahomey. This barbarian monarch chooses to have women for his body-guard, and his palace is surrounded by 1,000 of these amazons, armed with javelins and muskets, from whom he selects his special military aids and messengers. His ministers, when they come into the royal presence, are obliged to leave their silk robes at the gates of the palace and approach the throne walking on all fours, and rolling their heads in the dust. The ferocity of this African despot almost surpasses conception. The road to his residence is strewn with human skulls, and the walls are adorned and almost covered with jawbones. On public occasions the sable monarch walks in solemn pomp over the bloody heads of vanquished princes or disgraced ministers. At the festivals of the tribes, to which all the people bring presents for the king, he drenches the tombs of his fathers with human blood. Fifty dead bodies are thrown around the royal sepulcher, and fifty heads displayed on poles. The blood of these victims is presented to the king, who dips his fingers into it and licks them. Human blood is mixed with clay to build temples in honor of deceased monarchs. The royal widows kill one another till it pleases the new sovereign to put an end to the slaughter; and the crowd assembled at their most joyous festivals applaud such scenes of horror, and delight in tearing the unhappy victims to pieces."

Such is the king and court of a group of African tribes, and from this a reasonably accurate idea of his subjects may be formed. The difference between them and the negroes of the United States has been produced wholly by the slavery of the latter. The religious congregations and missionary societies of Europe and America have been for a century expending millions of money, and the energies and lives of devoted men and women, to Christianize and civilize the heathen negro of Africa, and the fruits of their long efforts are scarcely discernible. But upon the same stock, slavery in the United States exhibits four million negroes with a larger amount of physical comforts, intelligence, civilization, Christian instruction, and happiness than ever fell to the lot of that number of this race in any age of the world. We have often heard slavery denounced in this Chamber as "the sum of all villainies;" but, Mr. President, there is one more enormous villainy, and that is the manner in which slavery has been broken up. The premature liberation of several hundred thousand negroes, the unmeasured and immeasurable amount of misery and suffering consequent upon it, both to the living and the dead, and all that is yet to flow from it, will help to demonstrate this great and reckless wrong to the truth of history.

The deed, however, is done, and as I believe most foully done; but whether fairly or foully, I would not, if I could, undo it. It was one of those difficult, erroneous, and greatly mischievous movements, which, though it were better not to have been made, to reverse it is impracticable, or if practicable, the reversal would produce still more of mischief than good.

Mr. President, our country has just passed through a great revolution; four million negro slaves have been made free, and to effect it the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of all the slave States, were, for the time and the occasion, subverted. The insurgent States have submitted to the fortune of war, and have abolished slavery by provisions in their respective constitutions, and have adopted the amendment of the Federal Constitution by which it is forever prohibited in the United States. These were conditions imposed by the conquerors, and they were accepted, because of subjugation and the dread of a grinding and indefinite military despotism. The submission has been universal, complete; for the numbers resisting none was ever more so or in better faith. Irrespective of constitutional injunctions and obligations, magnanimity to the South would now be the truest policy of the nation. But there is an extreme faction which arrogates the largest share of the merit of this great triumph, as it is certainly chiefly responsible for the many enormous infractions of the Constitution and liberties of the people of the United States attending the suppression of the rebellion. That faction, astonished, bewildered, and intoxicated by the greatness of the revolution that has been effected, is now striking for another much more bold and atrocious.

More than thirty years ago there were two systems of policy propounded to the people of the United States that were in some aspects antagonizing, and others friendly—one by Massachusetts and the other by South Carolina. The first aimed at the destruction of negro slavery throughout the slave States by appeals to public opinion, and if it could not be effected, then the dissolution of the Union by the withdrawal of the free States from it, and the organization of a union of those States exclusively. The principle of the other was for the slave States to secede from the Union and to organize a confederation in which all the States should be slaveholding. Both systems were in derogation of the Constitution, both treasonable and revolutionary, and they both contemplated contingently a resort to arms. Both actively sowed discontent with the Union among the people, alike embarrassed the Government, and desired public disturbances and convulsion, hoping that such a state of affairs would forward their respective objects; and to that extent they were coöperating and allies. South Carolina contemplated to essay a peaceable secession; but if that was not conceded to fight for it. Massachusetts intended to effect the overthrow of slavery by any practicable means, and to work for the adoption of whatever would promise that result, without any regard to its justice or legality. The abandonment of the Union by the free States, although she had determined upon that, was to be her last card.

If the slave States could be involved in war with the General Government, and opportunity could thus be made to crush them and their slavery, that game she was determined should first be played. South Carolina was the less cool, more precipitate, and she played her game rashly, and it has been lost by wager of battle. Not that any principle of our Government can be lost or won by war or its issue. Secession was no less unconstitutional and inoperative, and it was no less the duty of the Government to oppose and defeat it before the war than it now is. South Carolina and the southern States have been vanquished and have submitted; and the decisiveness of the victory and the completeness and rectitude of the submission equally challenge the admiration of the world. To-day South Carolina even, and all the southern States, have a truer fidelity to the Constitution and the Union, to the form and spirit of our blended system of government, and the liberties of the people, and would be incomparably more trustworthy as their defenders, than Massachusetts.

South Carolina was once, and for a long time, true to our system of government and all its principles; Massachusetts never. In 1787, when the Constitution was being born into life, Massachusetts was in a state of insurrection against the United States. In 1806 she factiously opposed the policy and measure of our Government in the acquisition of Louisiana, because that vast country, being formed into States, would lessen her power and influence relatively in the Government and Union. In 1809, when our nation was young and feeble, and the British cruisers, under orders in council, were boarding our ships in every sea, tearing our flag from the mast-head, and dragging our sailors from their own decks to be impressed into the service of our enemy, and our Government, to avoid war, resorted to an embargo to constrain England to desist from those wrongs, Massachusetts condemned our own Government, denounced the embargo as invalid and inoperative, and disregarded it, continuing to trade with the public enemy, preferring to accept the outrage and degradation of the Government and people of the United States to the loss of her gainful traffic with England.

These wrongs were persisted in and multiplied by England, and as the dernier redress our Government declared war against her in 1812. That Massachusetts was then false and disloyal to the United States; that she gave not only her sympathy, but aid and comfort, to the enemy, and committed the crime of treason against the United States in many instances throughout the war; and that she was bought to these crimes by the gains of her traffic with that enemy, is matter of public history.

When Florida was acquired by treaty with Spain, factious and disloyal Massachusetts condemned the acquisition, and the Government for negotiating the treaty, which her Legislature solemnly resolved to be without authority, and that that territory was not thereby annexed to the United States. On the admission of Texas as a State the government of Massachusetts passed resolutions declaring the measure to be void, and she was not bound by it.

The constitutionality of the fugitive slave law of 1850 was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States and all the Federal and State courts before which the question was made; notwithstanding, the Legislature of Massachusetts passed a law to nullify it; and her people organized an armed rebellion to resist, and did resist, its execution; and in making that resistance, Batchelor, a United States marshal, who was in the performance of his duty, was killed, and this double crime of treason and murder is yet unwhipped of justice.

The first announcement of the ends of waging the war for the suppression of the insurrection, made by President Lincoln, and almost unanimously by the two Houses of Congress, was strictly constitutional and proper. It was simply to coerce obedience to the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States; and when that was effected the revolted States would resume their position in the Union and the Government, and they and their people would have all the rights of the other States and their people. It was to compel obedience only, and there was no power in the Government to require or to do anything beyond that. But, as the war continued, the purposes of those who waged it on behalf of the United States were enlarged, and they transcended the limits of the Constitution. It was assumed by them that slavery was the cause of the war, and must therefore be eradicated from the United States, as well to prevent it from producing future wars; and that when slavery should be everywhere abolished, and there was no longer a slave in the United States, and all the rebels had submitted to the Constitution and the laws, the war was then to terminate and the States were all to resume their respective positions in the Union and the Government. This was the second programme, and it has been fully executed.

And now comes up Massachusetts and her allies with a third programme, and what is it? To confer on the negroes recently freed the right of suffrage, and to introduce the miscegenation of the races in the southern States. Let us examine both branches of this new enterprise.

The freed negroes number about 4,000,000, and the male adults between six and seven hundred thousand, scattered over fifteen States. Kentucky, with 250,000 slaves of all ages, has about 40,000 men over twenty-one years. In our country, it has been the course of events for political parties to rise and fall every few years. The party in power have been guilty of flagrant general administration, and consequently has a large and fixed opposition to it in the adhering States; and in those that revolted, the white population are about unanimously its mortal foes. It would not be long after the southern States had resumed participation in the politics and government of the country, that the dominant party would have to surrender the seals of office, unless they can make some great accession to their numbers. It is neck or nothing with them, and what power is to save them? It is the negro alone, but he can serve and save them only by voting for them. It was that party which gave to the negro his freedom, and if he is permitted to vote, to it he will also owe that privilege. Massachusetts & Co. may count certainly upon being able to command the entire negro vote—it will always and promptly obey their behests.

For that power to be enthroned in Boston, and by its imperial will to direct how more than six hundred thousand negro votes, spread over fifteen States, should be cast in every election, is a great stake, for which a bold and desperate game is being played; and if won, it may save the fate and fortunes of the daring political gamblers who are playing it. With the aid of their negro allies, constituting more than half of the whole vote of South Carolina and Louisiana, nearly half of that of several other States, forty thousand in the State of Kentucky, and a heavy proportion in the remainder of the late slave States, and possessed of the Government, and wielding its vast powers and patronage singly to their own ends, they would be omnipotent; and standing in the name and according to its forms upon our subverted Constitution, they would be the absolute masters of the people.

But their aim is to embody the miscegenation of the races in the southern States as part of their system. They have noted the permanent national degeneracy and weakness produced in other countries by this blighting curse, and they contemplate similar results in the southern States. Without those results they know that a regenerated South would soon break away from the base thralldom with which they are seeking to envelope her; but with miscegenation and those results they might make the vassalage of the South to the North permanent.

By the census of 1860 there were 4,427,098 negroes in the United States, of whom 225,929 were in the nineteen free States, and 4,201,164 in the fifteen slave States, being 20 to 1. The negro revels in a warm climate, because to him it is both salubrious and indolent, favoring long life and large natural increase, requiring but little clothing, and furnishing him much of his food in spontaneous vegetables and fruits. Massachusetts & Co. know that he has invincible aversion to the cold northern States; and that even freedom, and some social and political privileges which they held out to the slave negro could not allure many of them to go there. They know that so soon as the few negroes resident in the northern States have the option the most of them will fly back to the sunny South. White labor is greatly the best for the border slave States, and especially Kentucky, with her nonpareil blue grass; economy and interest will push the negro from those States and he will go South, and the process will be expedited by the vexations and injustice of the "Freedmen's Bureau." The cotton, rice, sugar, and coffee plantations are the theater to which the negro laborer has been allotted by nature; everywhere beside he will be met and vanquished by his white competitor, but there this meeting will never take place. From all these causes the aggregation of the mass of the negroes of the United States in the southern States will progress rapidly.

Miscegenation would be encouraged by large numbers of the two races inhabiting the same country, and every law and regulation in favor of the white being broken down; by the white race becoming poor and broken in spirit, and cut off from position and office and political power; and the negro race being elevated as the other is depressed, and becoming the ruling power of the country. The white man is to be driven from his lands, and they are to be given to the negro and the negro's guardian angel, the Yankee. The white man finds the malaria of the country fatal—to the negro it is innocuous. The one can labor in the fields if he will; the other it would speedily transfer to the grave. But wherever money is to be made there is the omnipresent Yankee. He steps in and forms associations with the negro; he engrosses the cotton and rice and sugar lands; and by the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau, and often with its officers as his secret partners, seduces the negro laborers from the employment of the resident land-holders, if any of that class should be left, and himself monopolizes the entire labor of the country.

Thus the white resident is excluded from all part or lot in the cultivation and production, and eventually the ownership, of the lands; and all their avails, that can pass through the hands of the Yankee proprietor, go to the negro laborer. Poverty, destitution, and squalid want await the white residents and their families; and the men who devised this cruel and revolting system knew full well what cogent motive to miscegenation such a deplorable condition of the white race would offer to it. These august architects are gloating over the success of their crude and hastily tried scheme, and the misery it has even now brought on the southern people; and they are in haste to perfect it by supplementary and new measures of legislation. The whole scheme was concocted after long reflection, by able men, for mischief and oppression, and it was devised with diabolical forecast. The original proposition to amend the Constitution by abolishing slavery throughout the United States, was the first section; the combining the second section with it; the organization of the oppressive and infamous Freedmen's Bureau, with the object to degrade the white man and elevate the negro; the pending bill "to enlarge its power;" the bill "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication;" the pending measure, and the numerous bills to extend the right of suffrage, not to all the free negroes of the United States, but to those recently liberated in the late slave States, are all harmonious parts of a huge system of tyranny and iniquity, built up not only without any rightful power, but in all their essential features against the plainest and most vital constitutional restrictions of power. What condition and destiny that series of measures is intended to bring, and will bring, on the southern States, is illustrated by Mexico at this time.

The area of that country is about 894,000 square miles, and its total population 8,600,236, there being about eight persons to the square mile, a very sparse population for a country that has been settled so long, and has so much natural wealth. We are informed that of her people 1,000,000 are of the European race, 4,000,000 of Indians, 3,394,236 are mestizoes, or the mixed races, and only 6,000 negroes. The lower races have always the stronger desire to mix with the higher ones, and the negro being the lowest, has that proneness in the greatest degree, which explains why there is so small a number of negroes in Mexico. If there be any ennobling or regenerating power in miscegenation, the land of Cortez and Marina has had its full benefit.

At the time of the conquest of Mexico and Peru, the conquerors and their countrymen were the first people of Europe, and they maintained that proud ascendancy for some generations. In their colonies so long as the European race preserved its distinctness in the main, and did not extensively enervate itself by miscegenation and forming domestic alliances with the other races, it asserted its mastery and ruled their colonial affairs with resistless courage and vigor. The domination of these colonists of the Spanish race continued throughout the struggles of the colonies for independence and their first years of separate nationality, and was lost only when the gangrene of miscegenation had wasted the energies, and had sapped the hardy and warlike qualities of that portion of the people, then degeneracy, feebleness, and incompetency to rule came over them.

This decay of national virtue and prowess was most striking in the Spanish-American countries where there was the greatest admixture of the races; hence Mexico was conspicuous in that respect. In this unhappy country it has proceeded to such an extent as for some years to have threatened the overthrow of her social system. Industry, business, prosperity, law, order, and security seem long since to have fled from Mexico. Her people are powerless to conserve or to reconstruct anything; and their only manifestation of energy or effort is the rapid rise and fall of military factions, brigandism and general devastation, and the throes of a universally threatened anarchy. The example of Mexico is before us and in our neighborhood, and the cause of her debasement and misery is patent, known to everybody; and it is that the southern States may be brought to the same condition that reckless and wicked men are making such efforts to introduce it there. A frantic desire to punish the southern people, a demoniac and insane thirst for vengeance upon them, mixed up with an ignoble lust for power and office, for profit and money, are driving on those men and their frantic followers; and if they can accomplish their ends what care they for the unutterable woes that may be devolved upon their victims? The purpose is to bring the South to such a condition of weakness and abasement that it shall have neither the spirit nor resources to throw off the galling yoke of the North; that it shall become a permanent colony, and be made to pay tribute under measures and laws passed by the North to build up its own sectional interests; that it shall become so much Mexicanized as to be incapable of self-government, and its government by the North become a necessity.

Mr. President, there is a most novel, alarming, and indeed revolutionary aspect in public affairs at this time. The majority will not permit eleven States to be represented in either House of Congress, although seven of them have voted and been counted in favor of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States. There is not, and has not been for months, any rebellion, or insurrection, or resistance, or a single armed soldier or citizen in those States, or any one of them, against the United States, their laws or authority. On the contrary, those States are in full, formal, and real submission and obedience as the other States. A bold and desperate faction know that their mischievous and unconstitutional measures cannot obtain the requisite majority of the two Houses if the Union is unsevered and the Government in full and constitutional operation, by all the States being represented in both Houses. But this revolutionary movement is intended to operate not only upon Congress, but also upon the President; it is designed to emasculate his veto power, to prevent him having both or either House of Congress to sustain it if he should veto any of their unconstitutional and destructive measures.

Mr. President, this abolition radical party boasts that it is the party of development and progress. How much longer will it develop, and how much further will it progress, before the country will be aroused by the thunders of military pronunciamientos reverberating from ocean to ocean? We seem to be in the rapids, rushing on to the fatal cataract. Is there no power to save us? It seems to me as if our country had incurred the especial displeasure of the great Jehovah, by His allowing the madness of the people to bring on this great civil war. He has inflicted upon the nation one of his heaviest chastisements. The war has ceased, but the frenzied, wicked, and demoniac passions of the people still rage, and the men who profess to be His ministers of "peace on earth and good will among men," are the most active to continue and further inflame them. When this demonism is given up we may hope the vengeance of God to be satisfied.

Mr. President, our Constitution and the liberties of the people have not withstood this great civil war: that Constitution has been disrupted and its disjointed fragments scattered everywhere, and the liberties of the people torn into shreds by its terrific storms. The effective remedy is for the sovereign people of the United States to go into a national convention to replace the great foundation stones of their Government, and rebuild upon them the structure in its original proportions and harmony, making a few necessary and vital modifications in conformity to the teachings of experience. Among such modifications one would be, to organize New England into not more than two States. New York, by the census of 1860, has 3,883,735 people, and all New England but 3,135,293. The excess of the population of New York over all New England is only a small fraction less than the aggregate population of Rhode Island, Vermont, and New Hampshire. It will not be many years before eight or ten States will each have more population than the whole of New England. It is a wrong and dangerous adjustment of power for New York to have two Senators, and those six States to have twelve, and for fourteen presidential electors to be apportioned on the same principle, between New York and New England. Massachusetts has most generally formed the political principles and directed the political course of the other New England States. She has been, in truth, imperium in imperio, and has often most mischievously wielded their aggregated power. The principle of proportion between the population of the States and their weight in the Government, justice to the great States, and harmony among them all, require that New England should be made to surrender her great disproportion of power in the Senate and the presidential college.

Mr. President, throughout his whole history the negro has been found in but two conditions: living separately to himself as an ignorant savage, or with some other race of people as a slave or dependent. Freedom, with ignorance and barbarism, or slavery with civilization, is his destiny.

I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report allowing to the white citizens a form of government similar to our territorial governments.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the present and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. E. House.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. J. W. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House resolution No. 18, granting certain public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of Iowa.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution for reference to the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved, That in reestablishing Federal relationships with the communities lately in rebellion so as to permit them again to participate in administering the General Government, the following are necessary and proper requirements, and ought to be secured by such measures as will render them as far as possible immutable:

1. The absolute renunciation of all the pretensions and evasions of secession as a doctrine and as a practice.
2. The repudiation both by the State and by the national Governments of all public debts and obligations, including State and municipal liabilities contracted or assumed in aid of the late rebellion, and including also all claims by or on behalf of those who were in the military or naval service of the insurgents for bounty, pay, or pensions, and all claims by persons not loyal to the United States for damages or losses suffered by reason of the rebellion and for advances made in its aid.
3. The assurance of human rights to all persons within their borders, regardless of race, creed, or color, and the adoption of such provisions against barbarism, disorder, and oppression, as will relieve the General Government from the necessity of standing guard over any portion of our country to protect the people from domestic violence and outrage.
4. The impartial distribution of political power among all sections of the country so that four million people shall no longer be represented in Congress in the interest of sectional aggrandizement and at the same time be excluded from political privileges and rights.
5. The election of Senators and Representatives in truth loyal to the United States, and never ring-leaders in the late revolt, nor guilty of dastardly betrayals which preceded the war or of atrocities which war cannot extenuate.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise to inquire whether if this resolution shall go to the joint committee it will operate in any respect as instruction upon the part of the House?

Mr. CONKLING. It is intended that the resolution shall go to the committee, as every resolution goes that is referred, with out action upon it. My colleague knows how that is as well as I do, no doubt.

Mr. STEVENS. In order to avoid all difficulty I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he amend his resolution so as to make it a resolution of inquiry. This is an absolute instruction.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no instruction about it. It is simply a resolution which I offer on my own responsibility, for reference merely. It is merely a declaration to be referred to that committee.

Mr. RAYMOND. My question is, whether in presenting the question first to the House, to go from the House to the committee, the gentleman intends merely to express his own opinions on the subject? As he is a member of the committee, I can see no reason why he could not express his own opinion in the committee. There may be an implied instruction in sending this resolution from the House to the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose the fact that a member of the House is on a committee does not preclude him from introducing his, or another's, opinions here. Doubtless that right remains to him. This resolution is precisely like many resolutions offered by others, sometimes asking a vote in the House, which I do not ask, and sometimes asking, as I do ask, a mere reference to a committee, to the end that the resolution may be printed, and challenge criticism in the committee and in the House. It seems to me it is too plain and simple to be misunderstood, and too ordinary a proceeding to be in earnest the subject of discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. I would inquire whether, under the ruling of the Chair, this resolution does not go, without debate, to the joint committee of fifteen?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet offered.

Mr. FINCK. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the State of New York had been called regularly the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] would have had a right to offer this resolution, and it would have gone, without debate, to the committee on reconstruction. The gentleman, however, asked unanimous consent to offer the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Was not the question deliberately put to the House, whether there was any objection to the reception of the resolution? And did not the reading of the resolution the second time come after that question was put, and the Speaker announced that he heard no objection?

The SPEAKER. The colleague of the gentleman [Mr. RAYMOND] was understood to suggest a modification, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] called for the reading of the resolution, reserving his right to object.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Chair is mistaken in one respect. My colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] rose to inquire whether the resolution was designed as in any way instructing the joint committee on reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. That included the right to object. And the right to object was also reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] when he called for the second reading of the resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND. I did not rise for the purpose of objecting to the introduction of the resolution, but to inquire what would be the effect of it. I can state to my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] in one word, what was my opinion upon hearing the resolution read: that if it was presented here and referred to the joint committee on reconstruction it would be equivalent to a resolution reading, "Resolved by this House" that such and such things should be done. It would be equivalent to positive instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. I would ask how my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] could suppose any such thing?

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a question of order, that there is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the resolution, it is not before the House for discussion.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not very courteous in the gentleman on the other side, after my colleague has been heard, to object to a reply.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOGAN. I desire unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOGAN. I desire but a moment or two.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I trust the House will adhere to the regular order of business. I have a resolution myself which I desire to offer. But by adhering to the regular order of business every member will have an equal chance to offer such resolutions as he may desire to submit without asking unanimous consent. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] knows my friendly feeling toward him; still I must object to his offering a resolution at this time, and demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the calling of committees for reports.

MUTUAL, ETC., HOMESTEAD COMPANY.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with sundry amendments, House bill No. 26, to incorporate the United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company, and recommended its passage by the House, with the amendments.

The amendments were read.

The first amendment was to add to section one of the bill the following:

And this act shall continue in force for the term of five years and no longer.

The second amendment was to strike out of the list of corporators contained in the first section the names "Herschel V. Johnson, Georgia," "George W. Carter, Texas," "C. G. Forshey, Texas," and "Joshua Hill, Georgia," and insert after the words "John W. Stokes, Pennsylvania," the words—

Jackson S. Schultze, New York; Le Grand B. Cannon, Vermont; Robert Dale Owen, Indiana; George C. Ward, New York; Joseph H. Wiggin, Virginia; Robert Turner, Maryland.

The third amendment was to insert between the words "may" and "lease or purchase and hold lands," the words "by agreement in writing; and not otherwise."

The fourth amendment was to add to section two the following:

Provided, That all leases given or taken by said company shall provide that the lessee may purchase the lands leased at a price stipulated in the lease, at any time within the term thereof, which shall not in any case exceed the time when this corporation will expire by virtue of this act.

The fifth amendment was to strike out the words "in the annual elections," at the end of section four, and insert in lieu thereof the words "and no person or corporator shall vote upon more than one hundred shares."

The sixth amendment was to add at the end of the bill the following sections:

SEC. —. That before said corporation commences business the president, treasurer, and a majority of the directors shall sign, swear to, and publish three times in some newspaper printed in the District, and record in the office of the register of deeds for said District, a certificate setting forth the amount of the capital stock, the amount actually paid in, and within thirty days after the payment of any installment called for by the directors a certificate thereof shall be in like manner signed, sworn to, published, and recorded.

SEC. —. That in the month of January of each year the president, treasurer, and a majority of the directors shall sign, swear to, and publish three times in each of two newspapers printed in the District of Columbia a full statement of the amount of capital stock actually paid in, the amount invested in real estate, and the amount of existing demands against such corporation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask the especial attention of the House to this bill, for the reason that there is in the committee a divided judgment as to the expediency of passing it; and also from the circumstance that it is a departure, to some extent, from the general policy of the Government. It is a bill to incorporate a land company, with a capital of $3,000,000; the office of the company to be located in this District, for the purpose of encouraging emigration to and settlement in the States lately in rebellion against the Government. The ostensible and I believe the real purpose of the persons concerned is to encourage emigration to and to furnish facilities to persons, white or black, to purchase land in that section of the country.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In order to appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] I would suggest that the bill be read at length.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will ask that the bill be read in full.

The bill was then read at length.

Section one recites the names of nearly sixty persons, from the several States and District of Columbia, as corporators, who, with their successors, are constituted and created a body corporate in the District of Columbia, under the name and style of "the United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company," for the encouragement of settlements and the organization of industry in the American States, and in that name to have and use a common seal, to sue and be sued, and plead and be impleaded, and to fill vacancies in their own body arising from death or resignation.

Section two provides that the said corporators, or any thirty of them, after giving ten days' notice of the time and place of their meeting in two or more of the daily papers of Washington city, may organize the company by the election of twelve directors, who shall conduct its affairs, hold their offices for twelve months and until the election of their successors, elect a president of their own body, and appoint a secretary and treasurer and such other officers and agents as may be convenient or necessary, all of whom shall hold their offices as provided in the by-laws to be made by the directors for the management of the business; that the company may receive contributions for the promotion of emigration and for the dissemination of information to emigrants and landholders, and may lease or purchase and hold lands, and sub-let or sell and convey the same for use, settlement, and cultivation, and may also lend money on mortgage of lands or pledges of growing crops, with a view to promote the reorganization of labor on the basis of freedom and to promote the obtaining of homesteads by the landless poor.

Section three provides that whenever the company may deem it useful or necessary in prosecuting the objects aforesaid, they may open books for the subscription of capital stock to an amount not more than $3,000,000, in shares of ten dollars each, and may make such provision for the payment of subscriptions, and forfeitures for non-payment, as they may deem proper, provided that due notice of the time and place of opening said books shall be given by at least twenty days' publication in two or more daily papers of Washington city.

Section four provides that the general election of directors shall take place annually at such time and place as may be provided in the by-laws; and, until the company may provide for the subscription of stock, the directors shall be elected by the corporators named and their successors; but whenever the joint stock company may be established as provided by this bill, the shareholders shall become the successors of the corporators, and each share shall entitle the holder to one vote in the annual elections.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report of the Superintendent of Public Printing; which was referred to the Committee on Public Printing, and ordered to be printed.

MUTUAL, ETC., COMPANY—AGAIN.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, if the House has attended to the text of the bill as read, I shall be able to explain the amendments proposed by the committee, which all tend to restrict the powers of the corporators.

In the first place we limit the act to five years. The corporators are willing to take it upon that condition, trusting in their ability to commend themselves to the country by what they do. At any rate, a majority of the committee believe that this corporation cannot be so managed within that limited period of time as to produce any serious evils.

In the second place, we provide that every lease taken by this corporation shall contain a provision that the corporation may purchase lands leased within the period of the charter at a price stipulated; and that every lease given by the corporation shall also contain a provision by which the lessee may purchase the lands within the same period of time at a price stipulated in the lease, the object of that being to prevent persons in the South who may have large landed estates from leasing those estates as a whole, securing the rents, and by the income thus derived acquiring the means of holding these vast estates for a still longer period of time, the object being to introduce a policy by which those vast estates shall be broken up and distributed among a greater number of land-holders.

We have also provided in the amendments that no person shall vote upon more than one hundred shares of the stock of the corporation. We have also provided, by additional sections, that before this corporation shall enter upon business, it shall publish in a newspaper in this city, and record in the registry of deeds, a certificate containing a statement under oath of the amount of its capital actually paid in; and that, whenever any installment is assessed and collected, a similar notice and certificate shall be published and recorded; and that in the month of January in each year there shall be published in two newspapers of this city, for three successive times, a sworn statement of the capital stock of the corporation, the amount of property invested in real estate, and the amount of the indebtedness of the corporation.

We have thrown around this corporation all the safeguards that seem to be necessary. But after all, there is but a majority of the committee in favor of the passage of the bill. I am of that majority, and have therefore reported the bill, but without intending to make any further effort to secure its passage than the statements I have made.

Mr. DAWES. I observe, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments of the committee propose to strike out the names of several corporators from the States lately engaged in the rebellion. I desire to inquire of my colleague [Mr. BOUTWELL] what is the objection to having corporators from those States, if they are proper persons?

Mr. BOUTWELL. My colleague will observe that there are still remaining in the list of corporators the names of several persons from the States to which he has referred. The names which the committee propose to strike out are the names of persons in regard to whose loyalty and political relations to this Government the committee could not obtain exact information.

Mr. DAWES. I notice that among the names proposed to be stricken out is that of Joshua Hill, of Georgia. Has my colleague any doubts in reference to the loyalty of that gentleman? I have regarded Mr. Hill as one of the most loyal men of the South.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If my colleague's estimate of that gentleman is correct, the committee of course have no objection to him.

Mr. DAWES. I would not, of course, desire to have the name of Joshua Hill retained in this bill if I had myself any doubt on the subject of his loyalty; and if my colleague, or any other member of the House, has any good reason for doubting it, I would of course withdraw any suggestion of that kind. But, so far as I am concerned, I have been struck with the course which, as I have understood it from the public newspapers, Joshua Hill has pursued during the whole period of the rebellion. I was a personal friend of his before he left this House. I know that at that time he refused to follow the lead of other members from Georgia and other southern States; and while they withdrew from this House, leaving their States without representation here, he, contrary to the whole policy of those members, resigned his seat and went home; and there in Georgia he has always been, as I have understood, a true, loyal man.

In the late Georgia convention Joshua Hill spoke freely on that subject. There his loyalty to the Union never failed. There never was a time, sir, he said, if it had been in his power, he would not have crushed the rebellion from the beginning. There never was a time when he did not pronounce it to be the work of madmen.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I may be mistaken; but while I would join my colleague in his desire to exclude anybody from this corporation about whom there may be any reasonable doubt, I have a strong conviction that Joshua Hill is one of the few remarkable men of the southern country who maintained his loyalty against great odds and amid great danger and peril, and I hope that his name will be retained in this bill for that very reason. My colleague seems to have some information satisfactory to him; but I think those around me, who were in the Congress to which I refer, will bear testimony to the fact that Joshua Hill in that Congress was an exception to the other Representatives from the southern States.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, rendered necessary by the fact that, when he was making a statement of amendments to the bill I was momentarily absent from the Hall. I desire to inquire whether there is any limitation to the amount of property that may be held and the amount of profit that may be divided? I understand from the honorable gentleman that there is no such limitation upon the profits, and I suggest, before the bill should be passed, that a limitation shall be imposed upon the profits and the capital of the company. As the bill now is, this may become a monopoly for all sorts of speculation. If the bill does not contain such a provision of limitation, I give notice that at the proper time I will move such an amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I will refer to the suggestion of my colleague first. The name of Mr. Hill was omitted on account of the absence of information, rather than because of the existence of any knowledge of a political character. If the gentleman is of the opinion that he is a loyal man, I think that the committee will not object to the restoration of his name to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Some doubt arose as to Mr. Hill in reference to his being a member of the confederate congress. I have the information that he was not a member of that congress, and that he refused to hold office of any kind under the confederate government. The Mr. Hill who held office was another man.

And I state, further, on the suggestion of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that Mr. Hill was the Union candidate for Governor of Georgia. I think that there cannot be a question or a suspicion of Mr. Hill's loyalty being undoubted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will state one reason why the committee struck out certain names. They believed that all of the persons whose names are struck out belonged to the excepted classes in the amnesty proclamation of the President. We did not think it proper to confer corporate powers upon such people.

Mr. DAWES. I know that Mr. Hill, in the Georgia convention, was taunted by pardoned rebels with the fact that a man who had been a Unionist during the war, while they were defending the cause of Georgia, was held in contempt by the people of that State. He was further taunted that he was not thought as well of here at Washington as the man who had fought against the Union, because he had not succeeded in being pardoned. Mr. Hill replied that he did not believe that a man could stand better here at Washington with the Executive and authorities who had served the cause of the rebellion, even though that was the cause of the people of Georgia, than the man who had stood by the flag of the country, although a resident of Georgia. Mr. Hill said:

"I shall never alter the conviction which has been the motive for my conduct during the war, although it may take me out of the sphere of influence and confidence at Washington."

Said Mr. Hill:

"There never was a day when, if it had been within my power, I would not have crushed this rebellion as one of madness which has brought ruin upon my State and country."

Therefore there can be no question on the subject; and I am anxious that Mr. Hill shall be able to say to the rebels that what they taunted him with was not true.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to inquire of my friend whether it is not within his recollection that, when Georgia seceded, and her Representatives on this floor, recognizing that act of secession, vacated their seats and went back to Georgia, Mr. Hill stood here and refused to follow their example, and when nothing else was to be done, resigned like a man?

Mr. DAWES. My recollection is that a long time after the Representatives from Georgia left this House, Mr. Hill left it, and in his speech resigning his seat he was emphatic in the condemnation of the act of his colleagues, and in the most impressive manner urged upon them to return to their senses.

Mr. BOUTWELL. After the remarks that have been made, and the little opportunity I have had of conversing with my associates, I will ask that the name of Joshua Hill be omitted from the proposed amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is a very important bill; the amendments have only been read from the Clerk's table, and I hope the gentleman will consent to postpone the matter and have his bill as amended printed. This is an extraordinary measure, according to my judgment. It proposes to establish a mammoth corporation, with $3,000,000 capital, and endow it with special rights. I hope the House will not act hurriedly upon it, and trust that the gentleman will consent to have it printed and the consideration of his proposed amendments postponed to some future day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I would willingly accede to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], if it can be carried out upon an understanding, or an order of the House, that this bill is to be considered and disposed of at an early day. It is now the middle of January. I understand that these corporators have already several hundred persons with whom they are in correspondence, and who expect to go upon those lands in season for agricultural operations in the coming spring; and hence, if this bill is to be of any value, it should be passed immediately. I think the main question is one which this House can readily understand, whether the bill should be passed at all.

Mr. SMITH. I concur entirely in the remarks just made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] who introduced this matter this morning. I have been informed by many of these gentlemen, whose names have been read, that they have, as already remarked, several hundred persons who have agreed to emigrate to these States south for the purpose of putting in crops this spring, that they may produce cotton, sugar, and whatever else belongs to that section of country. And it is true that unless these people can go there soon, very soon, it will be impossible for them to enter upon their labors advantageously during the present year. It is well known to every man who understands the culture of cotton, or sugar, or rice, that he must begin his work, not as we do in the western country, or further north—as late in the season as April or May, or even June—but he must begin in January, and he must work through January, February, and on till the next January. And there are thousands and thousands of acres of land lying in that country uncultivated, with no purpose on the part of anybody to work the land at all. Therefore if this company, having a good purpose to accomplish, as I consider it—to send the working masses of the country who are unable to go themselves—are willing to advance their money and build up homesteads upon these large plantations, it is well that this House consider the matter at an early day, and give these people an opportunity to make a livelihood for themselves. I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will be concurred in, that if the bill must go back to the committee, or if the amendments must be printed for the benefit of the House, the House will fix a very early day when the bill shall be acted upon and passed.

Mr. COOK. I desire to state in a word the reasons that induce me to dissent from the opinion of the majority of the committee in relation to this bill. It will be seen that the bill provides for the incorporation of a company with a capital of $3,000,000, and gives them power to lease or purchase and hold lands, and to sub-let, sell, and convey the same for use, settlement, and cultivation, to lend money on mortgage of lands or pledges of growing crops, with a view to promote the reorganization of labor, &c. It provides for the incorporation of a stock company that shall open books of subscription and shall have power to do the things which are enumerated. It seems to me that this is a novelty in Federal legislation; that while many States have been accustomed to incorporate companies within their borders whose business is exercised entirely outside of the borders of the States where the corporation is made, such has not been the history of legislation in Congress. Companies have not been incorporated by Congress which shall act in the States exclusively. If this system of legislation is adopted, it seems to me to be a fair precedent for the incorporation by Congress of any kind of companies, for manufacturing or banking, or any other purposes, and superseding by the action of Congress the action of the State Legislatures entirely upon the subject of incorporations. The powers conferred upon this company are very great. There is no individual liability of the corporators. I was constrained to believe that it was not proposed that a corporation of this kind should be created by Federal legislation to operate exclusively outside of the District of Columbia, and in States where, if such an incorporation is desirable, it might be had by the agency of State legislation.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I am one of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary who were opposed to this bill. I hope it will receive the consideration of the House before it shall be passed. I do not propose to discuss it now, for I have not sufficiently considered it to give it that mature discussion which it deserves. I am not persuaded, however, either of the expediency of the measure or of our constitutional power to pass it.

Now, this bill proposes to incorporate a company either for charitable purposes or for purposes of gain. If its object be charity, it seems to me that the corporators named in this bill can as well execute their charity without an incorporation as with it. The Sanitary Commission and the Christian Commission for the last four years have performed great works of charity without any act of incorporation. But this is not a charitable corporation. Its purposes are set out in the second section of the bill, and I ask the attention of the House particularly to that section. It proposes to invest the corporation with power "to lease, or purchase, and hold lands, and sub-let or sell, and convey the same for use, settlement, and cultivation;" and they may also "lend money on mortgage of lands, or pledges of growing crops, with a view to promote the organization of labor on the basis of freedom, and to promote the obtaining of homesteads by the landless poor." In other words, it is proposed to organize a company, with a capital of $3,000,000, which shall have authority to buy up and lease immense tracts of land and sub-let them for the purpose of speculation.

Now, I am not satisfied of the expediency of this bill, and for that reason I am opposed to it. But I am opposed to it also because I am not clearly persuaded of our constitutional power to pass it. That Congress may create corporations, having for their object to aid in carrying out the purposes of the Government, I do not entertain any doubt; but I am not satisfied that we have power to enter in a general system of incorporations having for their purpose, not to carry out any power of the Government, but for the mere private purposes of the corporators, purposes of speculation. If this be so, if it be the purpose of Congress to embark in a general system of corporations, with power to effect insurances all over the country; with power to buy up lands and resell them all over the country; with power, in short, to do anything which men can do, then this bill may receive the sanction of Congress. But if Congress shall be unwilling to embark in a general system of incorporation for these purposes, then this bill ought not to pass.

I desired merely to call attention to the bill, and I hope that it will receive due consideration before it shall pass.

Mr. SLOAN. I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman who reported this bill in what provision of the Constitution he finds the power of Congress to organize corporations for this object? I cannot understand under what power of Congress we can embark in legislation of this character. It is entering into an entirely new field of legislation, and, in my judgment, it ought to be well considered before action is taken upon it.

In addition to the objections pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to suggest another. The State of New York has felt to a great extent the evil of individuals holding large and extensive tracts of land, and leasing them out for long terms of years. Now, this evil will be greatly aggravated and extended if you organize corporations, with the means of commanding very large capital, with the power of purchasing any amount of real estate, any amount of land in the seceded State, holding it for any length of time, and sub-letting it without restriction as to the number of years or the terms. In the State of Wisconsin we have provided by law, and I think by the constitution, that leases shall not be entered into which shall extend beyond the period of fifteen years.

Mr. BOUTWELL. One of the amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee limits the life of this corporation to five years. Every lease taken or given by the corporation must terminate within the period of five years. All their sales of land must be made within the period of five years.

Mr. SLOAN. I submit to the gentleman that this is a question which should be more fully considered, and that the bill and amendments should be printed and laid before us before action is asked upon it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask whether by general consent this bill cannot be passed over to-day, and printed, and come up to-morrow in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire in about five minutes. The Judiciary Committee are entitled to another morning hour. If this bill be ordered to be printed and recommitted, and the Committee on the Judiciary have any other business to occupy the remainder of the morning hour to-day, they will have power to report it back to-morrow.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Can it not be ordered to be printed without being recommitted?

The SPEAKER. The bill must be pending when the morning hour expires if it is to come up again to-morrow. The morning hour will expire in a few minutes. Has the committee any business to occupy the remainder of the morning hour?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, I will take this opportunity to reply to the inquiry made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] that while I would be disposed to limit the profits of this company if it were practicable, if any suggestion could be made which was feasible as to the use to which any surplus profits shall be applied, it appeared, I think, to the committee that it would be difficult to devise any practicable scheme by which these profits could be limited or any surplus appropriated. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] can suggest a plan that is at once just to the corporators and reasonable and proper in its other provisions, I am sure it will meet with no opposition from the committee.

In regard to the suggestion made as to the authority of Congress to pass this bill, I can only say that we have precedents in the line of this bill in insurance companies incorporated in this city with power to do business throughout the country. I believe it was only during the last Congress that we passed a bill creating a navigation company, called "the Potomac River Navigation Company," and various other companies, institutions, and corporations. These precedents existing, and being known to the committee, it is just to the committee to say that they did not deem it necessary to inquire into the question of the constitutional power of Congress to create corporations of this sort.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask what is the present condition of this bill, and whether it is now open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Amendments are proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. Amendments to those amendments and amendments to the original bill would be in order when the gentleman obtains the floor to offer them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to allow me to move an amendment to this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend section two of this bill by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That said corporation shall provide for all landless poor, without distinction of color, who may apply, a homestead of not less than one hundred and sixty acres of land free of charge.

Mr. GRINNELL. Put in "and provide agricultural implements."

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] refers to Maximilian's land.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I refer to any land this company may get the control of.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that this bill with the proposed amendments be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) granting public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, of Iowa; when the Speaker signed the same.

GRADE OF GENERAL IN THE ARMY.

Mr. DEMING. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back from that committee House bill No. 3, to revive the grade of general in the United States Army, and to move that the same be printed, and recommended to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF IMPOSTS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for collection of imposts;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business was the following concurrent resolution from the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States be authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House concur in the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] inform this House how long a time, in his opinion, will elapse before we can have some report from the joint committee after this investigation?

Mr. STEVENS. Everything done in that committee is a secret, and hence I cannot possibly give any information.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman must have joined the Know-Nothing society, to which it was formerly said some other gentlemen belonged.

Mr. STEVENS. But we do not belong to that branch of the society that swears. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania might, perhaps, give us his private opinion, not as organ of the committee, but his own private opinion as to how long a time will elapse before we will have here some representation from a large portion of this country. Or in another form, if the time is likely to be very long, will he not introduce a bill to have Representatives from those States as territorial Delegates?

Mr. STEVENS. In my judgment, the time will be so long that I shall be very glad to, and probably may, upon my individual responsibility, introduce a bill to provide civil governments for those Territories.

Mr. BROOKS. It must be very satisfactory to a large portion of the people who are to be taxed to have no representation here.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, they have taxed us considerably; I call for the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK called for the yeas and nays upon concurring in the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON called for tellers upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON and STEVENS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—aye, twenty-six; noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas, 125, nays 35, not voting 22; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Culom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClure, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Durt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—125.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Reader W. Clarke, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Kadford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sturgeons, Sturgis, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Winfield—35.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Chanler, Culver, Dawson, Dumont, Harris, Hotchkiss, Jones, McIndoe, McKuer, Newell, Pike, Rousseau, Shanklin, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Voorhees, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, and Wright—22.

So the resolution of the Senate was concurred in.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. O'NEILL stated that his colleague, Mr. THAYER, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that his colleague, Mr. VOORHEES, was unavoidably detained from the House.

The result of the vote was thus announced as above stated.

BARNEY CAIN.

Senate bill No. 53, an act for the relief of Barney Cain, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REV. JOHN C. JACOBI.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of House bill for the benefit of Rev. John C. Jacobi, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR HORSES IMPRESSED, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, also moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution relating to claims for horses, &c., impressed into the service of the United States; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

STARK, STAUFFER AND COMPANY.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, also moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Stark, Stauffer & Co., asking payment for a lot of bar iron, &c., taken at New Orleans by Major General Butler for the use of the United States; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JONATHAN HUNT.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, also moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Captain Jonathan Hunt, asking compensation for military services rendered by himself and his company, under orders from Brigadier General John McNeil, commanding the district of southwest Missouri, and that the same be referred to the select committee on the war debts of the loyal States.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF OHIO RIVER.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation by Congress, not exceeding $100,000, for the improvement of the Ohio river between Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Buffington's Island, West Virginia, the money to be expended under the direction of a practical riverman, to be appointed by the President, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KASSON, having obtained unanimous consent to make a statement, said: Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to an error which I committed yesterday in quoting from memory a sentiment which I understood him to utter in the speech which he made the other day. I referred to the gentleman as having said that the negro troops "won for us the victory."

He called my attention to that this morning. I referred to the Globe as containing his remarks as published, and I find that in quoting from memory I did him injustice. The sentiments he declared were the same as I uttered yesterday on that subject, the essential declaration being that they did their duty unshrinkingly and defiantly, doing their full share in securing the final victories for our armies. I am anxious always to correct any mistake I may have made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the gentleman to say that the limitation as published in the Globe is what I said. I will say that it is in accordance with the notes as written out by the reporter. I know that it is what I did say. I know it is exactly what I meant.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The morning hour having expired, the House, agreeable to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; on which Mr. JULIAN was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, whatever doubts may arise as to the authority of Congress to regulate the right of suffrage in the districts lately in revolt, none can exist as to such authority within the District of Columbia. By the express words of the Constitution, Congress here has "exclusive power of legislation;" and that power, of course, extends to all the legitimate subjects of legislation, of which the ballot is unquestionably one. Shall it be conferred irrespective of color, or granted only to white men? Shall Congress recognize the equal rights of all men in the metropolis of the nation and the territory under its exclusive control, or must our national policy still be inspired by that contempt for the negro which caused slavery, and finally gave birth to the horrid war from which we have just emerged? Shall the nation, through its chosen servants, stand by the principle of taxation and representation for which our fathers fought in the beginning, or reenact its guilty compact with aristocracy and caste? This is the question, variously stated, which confronts us in the bill before the House. It must now be dealt with upon its merits. To attempt to postpone or evade it is to trifle with the dangers and duties of the hour, and forget all the terrible lessons of the past.

Mr. Speaker, I demand the ballot for the colored men of this District on the broad ground of absolute right. I repudiate the political philosophy which treats the right of suffrage as merely conventional. The right of a man to a voice in the Government which deals with his liberty, his property, and his life is as natural, as inborn as any one of those enumerated by our fathers. It is said, I know, that natural rights are only those universal ones which exist in a state of nature, in which every man takes his defense and protection into his own hands; but I answer that there is no such state of nature, save in the dreams of speculative writers. The natural state of man is a state of society, which demands law, government, as the condition of its life. By the right of suffrage I mean the right to a share in the governing power; and while the peculiar manner and circumstances of its exercise may fairly be regarded as conventional, the right is natural. If not, then there are no natural rights, since none could be enjoyed except by the favor or grace of the Government, which must decide for itself who shall be permitted to share in its exercise. You may, if you choose, call the right of suffrage a natural social right; but whatever adjectives you employ in your definition, the right, I insist, is natural. Most certainly it is so in its primary sense. My friend from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] substantially agrees with me, for he speaks of suffrage, not as a privilege, but as a right, equally sacred with those acknowledged to be natural, and which Government cannot take away. Sir, without the ballot no man is really free, because if he enjoys freedom it is by the permission of those who govern, and not in virtue of his own recognized manhood. We talk about the natural right of all men to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness; but if one race of men can rightfully disfranchise another, and govern them at will, what becomes of their natural rights? The moment you admit such a principle the very idea of democracy is renounced, and absolutism must own you as its disciple. The fact that society, through Government as its agent, regulates the right, and withholds it in certain instances, as in the case of infants and idiots, and makes the withdrawal of it a punishment for crime in others, does not at all contravene the ground I assume. Society, for its own protection, takes away all natural rights, or rather, it declares them forfeited on certain prescribed conditions. Christianity and civilization place their brand upon slavery as a violation of the natural rights of men. But that system of personal servitude from which we have finally been delivered is only one type of slavery. Serfdom is another. That unnatural ownership of labor by capital which grinds the toiling millions of the Old World, and renders life itself a curse, is not less at war with natural rights than negro slavery. The degrees of slavery may vary, but the real test of freedom is the right to a share in the governing power. Judge Humphrey, speaking of the freedmen, says "there is really no difference, in my opinion, whether we hold them as absolute slaves or obtain their labor by some other method." The old slaveholders understand this perfectly. An intelligent human being, absolutely subject to the Government under which he lives, answerable to it in his person and property for disobedience, and yet denied any political rights whatever, is a slave. He may not wear the collar of any single owner, but he will be what Carl Schurz aptly calls "the slave of society," which is often a less merciful tyrant! He will owe to the mere grace of the Government the right to marry and rear a family; the right to sue for any grievance; the right to own a home in the wide world; the right to the means of acquiring knowledge; the right of free locomotion and to pursue his own happiness; the right to a fair day's wages for a fair day's work; the right to life itself, save on conditions to be fixed without his consent, and which may render him an alien and an outcast among men. So abject and humiliating is such a condition, and so perfectly does the world understand the sacredness of the rights of the citizen, that in all free Governments his disfranchisement is appropriately made a part of the punishment for high crimes. Sir, I repeat it, there is no freedom, no security against wrong and outrage, save in the ballot; and Governor Brownlow is therefore thoroughly right in principle, in contending that the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and giving Congress the power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce this abolition, authorizes us to secure the ballot to all men in the revolted districts, irrespective of color. It is not slavery in form, but in fact, and under whatever name, that the people of the United States intend to have abolished forever.

If I am right in this view, color has nothing whatever to do with the question of suffrage, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] will see. The negro should not be disfranchised because he is black, nor the white man allowed to vote because he is white. Both should have the ballot because they are men and citizens, and require it for their protection. Are you willing to rest your right to the ballot on the purely contingent fact of your color? Your manhood tells you instantly that that is not the foundation. You are a man, endowed with all the rights of a man, and therefore you demand a voice in the Government; but when you say this you assert the equal rights of the negro. Neither color, nor race, nor a certain amount of property, nor any other mere accident of humanity, can justify one portion of the people in stripping another portion of their equal rights before the law, the common master over all. Government, in fact, in its proper, American sense, is simply the agent and representative of the governed, in taking care of their interest and guarding their rights.

It is not the concern of the few, nor of the many, but of all. The negro, doubtless, would have been born white if he could have been consulted; and to take from him his inherent rights as a man because of his complexion is a political absurdity as monstrous as its injustice is mean and revolting. When you do it, you aim a deadly stab at the vital principle of all democracy. And if you may disfranchise the negro to-day on account of his race, or color, you may disfranchise the Irishman to-morrow, and the German the next day; and then, perhaps, you will be prepared to strike down the laboring man, the "mudsill," adopting the Virginia philosophy, that "filthy operatives" and "greasy mechanics" are unfit for political power. No absurdity or wickedness can be too great for a people who could thus deliberately sin against the great primal truths of democracy; and the logical consequence of the first false step, of any departure whatever from the rule which makes manhood alone the test of right, must be to continually narrow the basis of popular power till the end shall be a remorseless aristocracy or an absolute despotism.

Mr. Speaker, this view of suffrage as a natural right greatly simplifies the whole subject. The sole question is, as already stated, whether our democratic theory of Government shall be maintained in practically recognizing the inherent rights of all men as the source and basis of political power? To ask this question, in the United States, is to answer it.

And public policy, also, answers the question in the interest of the broadest radicalism. Duty and advantage will be found hand in hand in any fairly tested experiment of equal suffrage. According to the census returns of 1860, the colored population of this District was then over fourteen thousand. It is now estimated at about twenty thousand. The value of real and personal property owned by them is at least $1,225,000. They own twenty-one churches, supported at a cost of over $20,000 per annum. The whole number of their communicants is 4,300, with an average attendance of 9,000, distributed among their own religious communities, and among the Catholic and Episcopal churches of their white fellow-citizens. They have twenty Sabbath schools, with from three to four thousand scholars, and thirty-three day schools, attended by over four thousand scholars in the month of last November. Four thousand of the colored people can read and write. They subscribe for 1,250 copies of the National Republican, and about 3,000 copies of the Daily and Sunday Chronicle. There are more than thirty benevolent, literary, and civic organizations among them, by which their needy, superannuated, and infirm are cared for to a large extent, the city government having none or very few colored paupers to support. They furnished three full regiments for the national service, numbering in all 3,549, and from sixty to seventy per cent. of the drafts in the District were composed of drafted colored soldiers or substitutes. This, sir, is the character and condition of a class in this community ninety per cent. of whom were slaves at the beginning of the war, or their immediate descendants, many of them having purchased their own freedom and that of their families, and are besides property holders to a considerable extent. Sir, I call this a good record, if not a proud one. These people are here, and they will remain here, either as the friends or the enemies of the Government. If we shall give them their rights—a stake in society, an equal chance with the white man to fight the battle of life—instead of becoming an element of weakness and a source of danger they will be found our allies and friends, and thus lend unity and strength to the Government. If we shall continue to disfranchise and degrade them, we shall make them aliens, domestic foes in our midst, a perpetual menace of danger and discord, from which we shall suffer quite as much as the party thus wronged by our cruel folly. As a matter of mere policy, therefore, wholly aside from the question of right, I would give the ballot to every colored man of competent age in the District; and had I the power I would secure to him a home on the soil he has so long watered by his tears. I proposed this policy for the revolted States in a measure I had the honor to report to this House two years ago, providing for homesteads on the forfeited and confiscated lands of rebels; and had it prevailed in the Senate, as it did in this body, it would have wrought out the only true reconstruction of government and society in the South. The great want of every poor man is a home, along with the ballot with which to defend it. Russia, in giving freedom to her millions of serfs, secured to each one of them a homestead. Our policy should be the same. In the history of the world the ballot has generally followed the granting of homesteads to the poor; but the poor now should have the ballot as the surest means of attaining the homestead. Sir, there is but one remedy for the appalling picture recently presented by John Bright, of five million families in the United Kingdom who are unrepresented in Parliament, and whose utter helplessness, poverty, and degradation appeal in vain to the English aristocracy. That remedy, as righteously due these voiceless millions as the sunlight, is the ballot. That would "bend the powers of statesmanship to the high and holy purposes of humanity and justice," and at last make sure to the lowliest the blessed sanctuary of a home upon the soil, which is among the natural rights to secure which "Governments are instituted among men." In our own more favored country the ballot and the homestead may go together, and should be conferred at once. In the five great landed States of the South there yet remain about fifty million acres of public land unsold, all of which, if not prevented by law, will be open to rebel speculators. This should be set apart at once for actual homesteads in limited quantities, and a bill providing for this is now before the Committee on Public Lands. Every landless freedman in the country, should this measure prevail, will have at least a chance to become a freeholder, and thus to unite his destiny to the Government as its friend. This, or some kindred measure, is rendered absolutely necessary by the unfortunate failure of the policy of confiscation, and by what seems to me the criminal action of the Government in restoring to flagitious rebels, through pardons and otherwise, the vast and valuable lands which had vested in the nation through their treason, and are so greatly needed and have been so justly earned by the freedmen. Sir, no other policy than that of justice and equal rights can be trusted in dealing with these long-suffering people. Instead of driving them to thriftlessness and vagabondism, I would bind them to the Government through its parental care for their welfare. Let us give them the ballot; and then, should a public grievance come, they will bear it cheerfully, as self-imposed. They will bide their time, in the hope that at a future election the remedy will be found. "I can conceive no greater social evil," says Governor Parsons, of Alabama, "than a class of humanity in our midst so excluded from the social pale as to become a stagnant, seething, miasmatic, moral cesspool in the community. Human nature cannot improve without the moral incentive of hope in a human future." The policy of education, of moral development, can alone secure the just rights and the highest good of all races; and if the rulers of other countries were wise, they would apply this truth in dealing with their discontented and dangerous population. "Each class in England," says the Westminster Review, "as it has, by the natural progress of civilization, in time advanced to a consciousness of its own condition, and a comparison between itself and others, has in turn demanded to be admitted to a share in the Government. Each in turn has been admitted, and the country has grown more and more powerful, and the population more contented, as the basis of freedom has gone down lower and spread out wider." Sir, I trust this lesson of English history, slowly evolved, and now held up to us by English radicals, will not be slighted in dealing with the question of negro enfranchisement in our own country.

Mr. Speaker, if it shall be objected that the negroes of this District are not fit to vote; that they are too ignorant and degraded to be intrusted with power, I have several replies to make.

In the first place, the negroes of this District are not all ignorant, as I have already shown by facts. Many of them are educated and quite intelligent. The larger class who are not so will not suffer by a comparison with the very large class of their ignorant white neighbors. The "rounders" and ruffians who instigate mobs against harmless and peaceable colored people, and then publish their deeds as a negro insurrection, and who have probably been on the side of the rebels, in sympathy or in fact, during the whole of the war, are not the most fit men in the world for the ballot. They vote, and there is no proposition from any quarter to disfranchise them. The policy of Massachusetts, referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] would leave them untouched. I commend this fact to all the fair-minded opponents of negro suffrage.

In the next place, fitness is a relative term. Nobody is perfectly fit to vote, because nobody is perfectly informed as to all the subjects of our legislation and policy. Of the millions in our land who regularly go to the polls and pass upon the gravest questions, how many could stand even a tolerable examination on political economy, or constitutional law, or political ethics? How many men of good sense and fair intelligence could give a well-defined reason even for some of their most decided opinions? The truth is, all men are more or less unfit to vote, as all men are more or less unfit to discharge all their duties, civil, social, religious, or what not. The political opinions and actions of the generality of men, who in a free country govern, are not guided by logic, or any exact knowledge, but by habit and tradition, by their social relations, and by their natural trust in those whom they think wiser than themselves. On this subject the highest authority of which I have any knowledge is John Stuart Mill. He says:

"It is not necessary that the many should, in themselves, be perfectly wise; it is sufficient if they be duly sensible of the value of superior wisdom. It is sufficient if they be aware that the majority of political questions turn upon considerations of which they and all other persons not trained for the purpose must necessarily be very imperfect judges, and that their judgment must, in general, be exercised upon the characters and talents of the persons whom they appoint to decide those questions for them, rather than upon the questions themselves. This implies no greater wisdom in the people than the very ordinary wisdom of knowing what things they are and are not sufficient judges of. If the bulk of any people possess a fair share of this wisdom, the argument for universal suffrage, so far as respects that people, is irresistible."

Sir, by this standard I am willing to have the colored people of this District tried; and I demand the same trial for the white men who are loudest in their protest against negro ballots.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in his reference to the opinion of John Stuart Mill, he quotes that distinguished writer as in favor of unqualified suffrage?

Mr. JULIAN. No, sir. I quoted from him simply to show his opinion as to the measure of intelligence deemed by him necessary to qualify men for suffrage. I quoted the extract because it sustains the point I am arguing.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not ask the question with a view of opposing any doctrine the gentleman is advocating, but merely to suggest that Mr. Mill, in the volume from which the gentleman has just quoted, takes strong ground in favor of suffrage restricted by educational qualifications.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I understand my colleague to base his argument in favor of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia upon the personal right of suffrage. I desire to ask my colleague whether he regards that as a personal right elsewhere than in the District of Columbia; and whether, as a citizen of Indiana, where, it is notorious, negroes have not for years past been permitted to migrate, he is willing to extend that right to his own State?

Mr. JULIAN. I shall refer to that question presently; and answer it, I think, to the satisfaction of my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana. Does he propose to extend the right of suffrage, which he proposes to confer upon the negro race, to the Indians, who are the original inhabitants of this country?

Mr. JULIAN. I have already said that neither race nor color should stand in the way of suffrage as a natural right. The people, in accordance with the fundamental principles of democracy, must regulate the whole question of suffrage. A portion of our Indians, who have become citizens and civilized, have already been made voters. There may be practical difficulties in the regulation of the right of suffrage as to savage tribes in their transition from barbarism to civilization, but I do not see how they affect the soundness of my position.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the gentleman to say that this is a natural right, and that none are to be denied its exercise. I ask the gentleman when the founders of the "Old Bay Colony," the Puritans, proclaimed jurisdiction over numerous wild and savage tribes, if they would have been safe in giving to those Indians the right of suffrage?

Mr. JULIAN. If the gentleman had listened to my remarks his question would probably have been deemed unnecessary. I endeavored to show, in the first part of my argument, that the authority of the Government to regulate the right of suffrage—that is, to prescribe the manner and circumstances of its exercise—does not contravene the right itself as natural. I commend him to a careful perusal of that part of my speech. Of course I would have withheld the ballot in the case stated, for the same reasons that suffrage is withheld from infants, idiots, and madmen. In saying this I do not see that I abandon the ground of the natural right to a voice in the Government of a civilized people as to its citizens.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was out of the Hall and did not hear that part of his speech.

Mr. KELLEY. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I would like to inquire of my friend from Michigan [Mr. Dargatzis] whether the Indians, who filled the ranks of a regiment from his own State, in Burnside's corps, when it passed through this city, are not voters in his district?

Mr. DRIGGS. They were. The laws of the State provide that all civilized Indians, not belonging to a tribe or recognizing a chief, shall be allowed the right of the elective franchise. I think there are about four hundred Indian voters in my district, and nearly all of them voted for me. I may add, as pertinent to the question, that not only are Indians allowed to vote, but they have represented districts in the State Legislature, and in one instance an Indian was a candidate for judge of the circuit court.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe that civilization presumes something of education. That has been my understanding of the word civilization ever since I could read. I have never said that where Indians have been civilized they should not have the right of suffrage.

Mr. JULIAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] and the gentleman from Michigan for the fact stated. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Davis] that as to the right of savages to vote I am no more in favor of it than himself.

Mr. Speaker, mere knowledge, education, in its ordinary sense, will not fit any man to vote. It must depend, as Dr. Lieber says, upon how men use it. He declares it to be no guarantee for free institutions, and refers to Prussia, the best-educated country in the world, where liberty is an outlaw. The reading and writing test, so strenuously urged on this floor, is a singularly insufficient measure of fitness. Reading and writing are mechanical processes, and a man may be able to perform them without any worthiness of life or character. He may lack this qualification, and yet be tolerably fit to have a voice in the Government. If penmanship must be made the avenue to the ballot, I fear several honorable gentlemen on this floor will be disfranchised. A merely educational test would allow all the rebel leaders to vote, while the great body of the people of the South, white and colored, would be disfranchised. Sir, education of the heart is far more important than that of the brain. "The soul is greater than logic." The hearts of the negroes have been unflinchingly with us all through the war, inspiring their judgment, vivifying their convictions, and insuring their universal loyalty. They, of all men in the South, have best vindicated their title to the ballot.

Mr. Speaker, our American democracy has never required any standard of knowledge as a condition of suffrage; and the educational test, invented by the Know-Nothings some years ago, during their raid against the foreigners, would not now be thought of but for our proverbial hatred of the negro. According to our census tables, more than a half million men in our country annually go to the polls who can neither read the Constitution nor write their names. The proposition to disfranchise this grand army of ignorant men would meet with very little favor in any quarter. No public man dreams of it, and any such purpose as to the ignorant white men of this District is expressly disavowed by the advocates of restricted suffrage in this House. Sir, the real trouble is that we hate the negro. It is not his ignorance that offends us, but his color; for those who are loudest in their opposition to universal suffrage would be quite as unwilling to give the ballot to Frederick Douglass as to the most ignorant freedman in the South. Of this fact I entertain no doubt whatever, and I commend it to the attention of conservative gentlemen on this floor, who imagine that a vote for qualified negro suffrage will be less offensive to their negro-hating constituents than for the bill now under discussion.

In further reply to the argument which would disfranchise the negroes on account of their ignorance, allow me to say that the ruling class have made them ignorant by generations of oppression, and no man should be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. Sir, how can the negro emerge from his ignorance and barbarism if left under the heel of his old tyrant? I agree that in any scheme of universal suffrage universal knowledge, as far as possible, should be demanded; but universal suffrage is one of the surest means of securing a higher level of intelligence for the whole people. I would not level the educated classes downward, but the ignorant masses upward, by giving them political power and the incentive to rise. Our first duty is to take off their chains, as the best means of preparing them for the ballot. By no means would I disparage education, and especially political training; but the ballot is itself a schoolmaster. If you expect a man to use it well you must place it in his hands, and let him learn to cast it by trial. If you wish to teach a man to swim, you must first put him in the water. If you wish to teach him how to handle the tools of the mechanic, you must first put them in his hands. If you wish to teach the ignorant man, black or white, how to vote, you must grant him the right to vote as the first step in his education. The negro, I am sure, will generally be found voting on the side of his country, and gradually learning his duties as a citizen. Sir, let one rule be adopted for white and black, and let us, if possible, dispossess our minds, utterly, of the vile spirit of caste which has brought upon our country all its woes.

Mr. Speaker, I reply still further, that my argument is not at all invalidated if I admit that the white people of this District are decidedly superior to the negroes in education and general intelligence. This very superiority would give them an important advantage over the class not thus favored. It would become a powerful weapon in carrying out their peculiar purposes; and these will certainly be antagonistic to the best good of those whom law and usage have so long injured and degraded. If any class will be peculiarly exposed, and need the strongest safeguards, it will be the negroes, who have been made comparative children in knowledge and self-help. All class rule is vicious; but if one class must rule another, it will be found far better to allow the prerogative to the laboring many, whose usefulness and numbers best entitle them to it, than to confer it upon the aristocracy, the "gentlemen," the idlers, who will of course maintain their privileges. The many who have been denied equal rights, and suffered from the privation, will be quite as fit for political power as the few who have had no such experience.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I need not reply to the argument often urged, that negro voting will lead to the amalgamation of races, or social equality, which now seems to mean the same thing. On this subject there is nothing left to conjecture, and no ground for alarm. Negro suffrage has been very extensively tried in this country, and we are able to appeal to facts. Negroes had the right to vote in all the Colonies save one, under the Articles of Confederation. They voted, I believe, generally, on the question of adopting the Constitution of the United States. They have voted ever since in New York and the New England States, save Connecticut, in which the practice was discontinued in 1818. They voted in New Jersey till the year 1840; in Virginia and Maryland till 1833; in Pennsylvania till 1838; in Delaware till 1831; and in North Carolina and Tennessee till 1836. I have never understood that in all this experience of negro suffrage the amalgamation of the races was the result. I think these evils are not at all complained of to this day in New England and New York, where negro suffrage is still practiced and recognized by law. Indeed, the fact is notorious, that amalgamation is almost totally unknown, except in a state of slavery, which obliterates the ties of life, and subjects the negro woman to the unbridled power of the master race. Sir, give the colored man the ballot, so that he may maintain the liberty already nominally conferred, and the best possible step will have been taken to regulate and purify the relations heretofore existing between the races. Should the copperheads and rebels of this District feel in danger of matrimony with their African fellow-citizens in consequence of negro suffrage, I would have Congress pass a law for their protection; but I would not withhold the ballot from the colored people for a reason so contingent and so uncomplimentary to their character and taste.

Nor do I deem it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to dwell on the argument that negro voting will lead to negro office-holding, negro domination, and ultimately to a war of races. Such an argument, current as it is in certain quarters, finds no shadow of support in any known facts. The experience to which I have referred certainly can alarm no one, and the instances are rare, if in fact any can be adduced, in which colored men have held office, though their numbers, as in States like Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland, were very large when black suffrage was allowed. Sir, no fact is more notorious, and at the same time more discreditable, than the nearly universal prejudice of the white race in our country against the negro. That prejudice will not pass away swiftly, but gradually and slowly. Like every other form of injustice, it will ultimately die; but the prospect of this is clearly not immediate. We are certainly not yet so in love with the negro that we prefer him as our ruler; but when the fact shall be realized, it will not be negro domination, but negro rule of choice, by white as well as black suffrage, and cannot therefore lead to any war of races. This is quite evident; for though the negroes here are numerous, and in portions of the South constitute the majority, the tide of emigration from the North and from Europe must very soon place the white race largely in the ascendant everywhere. I present these considerations in order, if possible, to calm the fears of my conservative friends; for as to myself, my faith in democratic principles depends not at all upon any temporary or local results of their application. Sir, a war of races in this country can only be the result of denying to the negro his rights, just as such wars have been caused elsewhere; and the late troubles in Jamaica should teach us, if any lesson can, the duty of dealing justly with our millions of freedmen. Like causes must produce like results. English law made the slaves of Jamaica free, but England failed to enact other laws making their freedom a blessing. The old spirit of domination never died in the slave-master, but was only maddened by emancipation. For thirty years no measures were adopted tending to protect or educate the freedmen. At length, and quite recently, the colonial authorities passed a whipping act, then a law of eviction for people of color, then a law imposing heavy impost duties, bearing most grievously upon them, and finally a law providing for the importation of coolies, thus taxing the freedmen for the very purpose of taking the bread out of the mouths of their own children! I believe it turns out, after all, that these outraged people even then did not rise up against the local government; but the white ruffians of the island, goaded on by their own unchecked rapacity, and availing themselves of the infernal pretext of a black insurrection, perpetrated deeds of rapine and vengeance that find no parallel anywhere, save in the acts of their natural allies, the late slave-breeding rebels, against our flag. Sir, is there no warning here against the policy of leaving our freedmen to the tender mercies of their old masters? Are the white rebels of this District any better than the Jamaica villains to whom I have referred? The late report of General Schurz gives evidence of some important facts which will doubtless apply here. The mass of the white people in the South, he says, are totally destitute of any national feeling. The same bigoted sectionalism that swayed them prior to the war is almost universal. Nor have they any feeling of the enormity of treason as a crime. To them it is not odious, as very naturally it would not be, under the policy which foregoes the punishment of traitors, and gives so many of them the chief places of power in the South. And their hatred of the negro to-day is as intense and seething and as universal as before the war. I believe it to be even more so. The proposition to educate him and elevate his condition is everywhere met with contempt and scorn. They acknowledge that slavery, as it once existed, is overthrown; but the continued inferiority and subordination of the colored race, under some form of vassalage or serfdom, is regarded by them as certain. Sir, they have no thought of anything else; and if the ballot shall be withheld from the freedmen after the withdrawal of military power, the most revolting forms of oppression and outrage will be practiced, resulting, at last, in that very war of races which is foolishly apprehended as the effect of giving the negro his rights.

Mr. Speaker, a more plausible, if not a more formidable, objection to negro suffrage in this District remains to be noticed. Most of the northern States refuse the ballot to their colored citizens, and even deny them their testimony in suits in which white persons are parties. In Indiana, which has done so noble and glorious a part in the war, we have a constitutional provision, and laws made in pursuance of it, by which negroes from other sections of our country are forbidden to enter the State. It is made a penal offense for any negro or mulatto to come into her borders, or for any white person to bring him in, or employ him after he shall have come. Now, how can the Representatives of such States be expected to vote for negro suffrage in this District? If Congress, having the sole and exclusive power of legislation here, ought to give the ballot to the negro, why should not Indiana give the ballot to her negro population? And how can western Representatives face their constituents and answer this question, after having supported this bill? And it is just here that its passage must encounter its greatest peril; for members of Congress, however patriotic, will be exceedingly glad to escape this dilemma, and to avoid the commitment to the policy of negro suffrage generally, which would seem to be implied in the support of this measure.

In seeking to meet this difficulty several considerations must be borne in mind. In the first place, the demand for negro suffrage in this District rests not alone upon the general ground of right, of democratic equality, but upon peculiar reasons superinduced by the late war, which make it an immediate practical issue, involving not merely the welfare of the colored man but the safety of society itself. If civil government is to be revived at all in the South, it is perfectly self-evident that the loyal men there must vote; but the loyal men are the negroes, and the disloyal are the whites. To put back the governing power into the hands of the very men who brought on the war, and exclude those who have proved themselves the true friends of the country, would be utterly suicidal and atrociously unjust. Negro suffrage in the districts lately in revolt is thus a present political necessity, dictated by the selfishness of the white loyalist as well as his sense of justice. But in our western States, in which the negro population is relatively small, and the prevailing sentiment of their white people is loyal, no such emergency exists. Society will not be endangered by the temporary postponement of the right of negro suffrage till public opinion shall render it practicable, and our western Representatives can thus vote for this bill without encountering any reasonable hostility from their conservative constituents, and leaving the question of suffrage in the loyal States to be decided by them on its merits. If Indiana had gone out of her proper place in the Union, and her loyal population had been found too weak to force her back into it without negro bullets and bayonets, and if, after thus coercing her again into her constitutional orbit, her loyalists had been found unable to hold her there without negro ballots, the question of negro suffrage in Indiana would most obviously have been very different from the comparatively abstract one which it now is. It would, it is true, have involved the question of justice to the negroes of Indiana, but the transcendently broader and more vital question of national salvation also. Let me add further, that should Congress pass this bill, and should the ballot be given to the negroes in the sunny South generally, those in our northern and western States, many of them at least, may return to their native land and its kinder skies, and thus quiet the nerves of conservative gentlemen who dread too close a proximity to those whose skins, owing to some providential oversight, were somehow or other not stamped with the true orthodox luster.

It should be further remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the bill before us relates exclusively to this District, and those municipal and police powers which are to be exercised here under the laws of Congress. Were it in fact dangerous and unwise to give the negro a voice in the general legislation of the country, I can see no objection whatever to the experiment of black suffrage in this District, in the purely local administration of its affairs. For very excellent reasons, already given, I believe the negroes here are entitled to the ballot, and are at least as fit as multitudes of white men who are unquestionably to have it. They have done their full share in saving the nation's life. Many of them went into the Army as the substitutes of white ruffians and vagabonds who daily "damn the nigger," and whose unprofitable lives were saved by the black column which stood between them and the bullets of the rebels. Sir, let the experiment be fairly made here, on this model political farm of the nation. Should it fail, Congress will abandon it; should it work well, it may prove a most excellent forerunner of measures of larger justice to the colored race in our land. I do not mean to say that the colored soldiers of this District should alone have the ballot, because no such rule is proposed or thought of as to white voting. If the white rabble of this District who did not enter our Army, and who to a great extent were in sympathy with the public enemy, are to vote, as they undoubtedly will, it would be a very mean mockery of justice to withhold the ballot from loyal negroes who, although they did not fight, furnished the Government with their full share of men.

Mr. Speaker, I ask conservative gentlemen on this floor to consider duly one other fact. If difficulties are to be encountered in voting for this bill, still greater difficulties are to be met in voting against it, and I know of no half-way ground in dealing with fundamental principles. To vote against this measure is to vote against the first truths of democratic liberty. It is to vote for the old spirit of caste and the old law of hate which have so terribly blasted our land. It is to vote down justice and install misrule and maladministration as king. It is to sanction and encourage, by the national example, the barbarous and worse than heathen laws of the northern and western States, already referred to, which so loudly call for our rebuke. It is to make a record which the roused spirit of liberty and progress, and the thick-coming events of the future, will certainly disown and turn from with shame. And while such a vote might tend to placate the conservative and the trimmer, it would offend those radical hosts now everywhere springing to their feet, and preparing for battle against every form of inequality and injustice, and in favor of "all rights for all." Sir, justice is safe. The right thing is the expedient thing. Democracy is not a lie. God is not the devil, "nor was Christianity itself established by prize essays, Bridgewater bequests, and a minimum of four thousand five hundred a year." Far better will it be for a northern Representative and for the cause of Republicanism itself to vote on the right side of this question, even should it cost him his seat on this floor, than to vote on the wrong side, and thus maintain his place by the sacrifice of both his own manhood and the public welfare intrusted to his hands. Sir, I agree that the passage of this bill would tend to open the way to perfect equality before the law in all the States. I do not deny that the public would so understand it, and I decline none of the consequences of my vote. Mr. Jefferson, speaking of the negroes, declared that "whatever be their degree of talent it is no measure of their rights," and he likewise declared that "among those who either pay or fight for their country no line can be drawn." That is my democracy. "The one idea," says Humboldt, "which history exhibits as evermore developing itself into greater distinctness, is the idea of humanity, the noble endeavor to throw down all barriers erected between men by prejudice and one-sided views, and, by setting aside the distinctions of religion, country, and color, to treat the whole human race as one brotherhood." Sir, on this broad ground, coincident with Christianity itself, I plant my feet; and no man can fail who will resolutely maintain it.

Mr. Speaker, I must not conclude my argument without referring to one further consideration, by which the passage of this bill, in my judgment, is urgently demanded. I have argued that the ballot should be given to the negroes as a matter of justice to them. It should likewise be done as a matter of retributive justice to the slaveholders and rebels. According to the best information I can obtain, a very large majority of the white people of this District have been rebels in heart during the war, and are rebels in heart still. That contempt for the negro and scorn of free industry which constituted the mainspring of the rebellion cropped out here during the war in every form that was possible, under the immediate shadow of the central Government. Meaner rebels than many in this District could scarcely have been found in the whole land. They have not been punished. The halter has been cheated out of their necks. I am very sorry to say that under what seems to be a false mercy, a misplaced humanity, the guiltiest rebels of the war have thus far been allowed to escape justice. I have no desire to censure the authorities of the Government for this fact. I hope they have some valid excuse for their action. This question of punishment, I know, is a difficult one. The work of punishment is so vast that it naturally palsies the will to enter upon it. It never can be thoroughly done on this side of the grave. And were it practicable to punish adequately all the most active and guilty rebels, justice would still remain unsatisfied. Far guiltier men than they are the rebel sympathizers of the loyal States, who coolly stood by and encouraged their friends in the South in their work of national rapine and murder, and while they were ever ready to go joyfully into the service of the devil, were too cowardly to wear his uniform and carry his weapons in open day. But Congress in this District has the power to punish by ballot, and there will be a beautiful, poetic justice in the exercise of this power. Sir, let it be applied. The rebels here will recoil from it with horror. Some of the worst of them, sooner than submit to black suffrage, will doubtless leave the District, and thus render it an unspeakable service. To be voted down and governed by Yankee and negro ballots will seem to them an intolerable grievance, and this is among the excellent reasons why I am in favor of it. If neither hanging nor exile can be extemporized for the entertainment of our domestic rebels, let us require them at least to make their bed on negro ballots during the remainder of their unworthy lives. Of course they will not relish it, but that will be their own peculiar concern. Their darling institution must be charged with all the consequences of the war. They sowed the wind, and if required must reap the whirlwind. Retribution follows wrong doing; and this law must work out its results. Rebels and their sympathizers, I am sure, will fare as well under negro suffrage as they deserve, and I desire to leave them, as far as practicable, in the hands of their colored brethren. Nor shall I stop to inquire very critically whether the negroes are fit to vote. As between themselves and white rebels, who deserve to be hung, they are eminently fit. I would not have them more so. Will you, Mr. Speaker, will even my conservative and Democratic friends, be particularly nice or fastidious in the choice of a man to vote down a rebel? Shall we insist upon a perfectly finished gentleman and scholar to vote down the traitors and white trash of this District, who have recently signalized themselves by mobbing unoffending negroes? Sir, almost anybody, it seems to me, will answer the purpose. I do not pretend that the colored men here, should they get the ballot, will not sometimes abuse it. They will undoubtedly make mistakes. In some cases they may even vote on the side of their old masters. But I feel pretty safe in saying that even white men, perfectly free from all suspicion of negro blood, have sometimes voted on the wrong side. Sir, I appeal to gentlemen on this floor, and especially to my Democratic friends, to say whether they cannot call to mind instances in which white men have voted wrong? Indeed, it rather strikes me that white voting, ignorant, depraved, party-ridden Democratic white voting, had a good deal to do in hatching into life the rebellion itself, and that no results of negro voting are likely to be much worse. I respectfully commend this consideration to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and to conservative gentlemen here on both sides of this Hall. Sir, as I have argued elsewhere, all men are liable to make mistakes. The democracy I stand by, the fitness to govern which I believe in, is the aggregate wisdom and practical common sense of the whole people. This, and not the wisdom of our rulers, or of any select few, carried us safely through the rebellion, and this only can be trusted in time to come. There is no other reliance under God for us, as the champions and exemplars of Republicanism, and the sooner we bravely accept this truth the better it will be for all races and orders of men composing our great body-politic. In demanding the ballot in this District for the despised and defenseless, I simply demand the national recognition of Christianity, which is "the root of all democracy, the highest fact in the rights of man." I beseech gentlemen to remember this. As the lawgivers of a disenthralled Republic, let us not write "infidel" on its banner, by trampling humanity and justice under our feet in these high places of power. The question is ours to decide. The right, so earnestly prayed for, is ours to bestow. The assumption set up by the white voters here of the right to decide this question is as superlatively ridiculous as it is sublimely impudent. They have no more right to vote themselves the exclusive depositaries of power in this District than the inmates of its penitentiary have to vote themselves at liberty to go at large. Congress is the sovereign and sole judge; and what the colored men here ask at our hands, for their just protection, and as their sure refuge, is the ballot:

"A weapon firmer set,
And better than the bayonet;
A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will
As lightning does the will of God."

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor; but stated that he desired to yield a portion of his time to Mr. SITGREAVES.

Mr. SITGREAVES. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to refute an aspersion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] upon the New Jersey Democracy and her Representatives on this floor, made in answer or reply to my colleague, [Mr. ROGERS.] I allude to the assertion that the Legislature of New Jersey, controlled by the Democracy, had voted against the right of the soldiers to vote in camp, and the inference sought to be adduced from that by the gentleman, that the Representatives from New Jersey, representing the Democracy here, had no right and could not consistently speak in favor of the honor or the rights of the soldier. I quote from the Globe, as follows:

"If I am not mistaken the gentleman, with the rest of his party in the State of New Jersey, refused to give to the white soldier who had left his native State and gone into the field, periling his life in the defense of his country, the right to vote even as to who shall represent that State in the Congress of the United States. Perhaps that is the reason why we have had so many of that persuasion in this House. Now the gentleman invokes the white soldier, and protests against this injustice which should be done him."

Mr. Speaker, when the bill was pending before the Legislature to authorize the soldiers to vote in camp; many gentlemen of the Democratic party conscientiously believed that they could not vote for that bill without violating their constitutional oaths. Others as conscientiously believed that no fair vote would ever be had in the camp; and surely the history of elections in the camp must have satisfied every friend of the purity and independence of the ballot-box that they were right. I will quote that article in the constitution of the State of New Jersey to which I particularly allude:

"Every white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of this State one year, and of the county in which he claims a vote five months next before the election, shall be entitled to vote for all officers that now or hereafter may be elected by the people."

Now, Mr. Speaker, to charge the Democracy of New Jersey with being unfriendly to the soldiers, and by inference, to the cause for which the soldier fought, is ungenerous and unjust. Let facts answer.

In 1861, when the President of the United States called for troops to defend this capital, New Jersey soldiers were foremost among those who marched to the rescue, and a New Jersey brigade was the first organized brigade in the front. The Legislature of New Jersey—a Democratic Legislature—was convened at extra session. Ample means were provided for the raising and equipment of troops. Fifteen dollars a month were guaranteed to the soldiers during the whole war—four dollars more than was then paid by the General Government.

In 1862 the Democracy of New Jersey controlled the political power of the State, both in its executive and legislative branches. No more fervent appeals were made to the patriotism of the people to sustain the laws than were made by Joel Parker, Democratic Governor of New Jersey. No more liberal legislation was devised by any State to carry on the war than by the Democratic Legislature of that State.

Mr. STARR. I would like to ask my colleague whether I understood him to state that the Democratic Legislature of New Jersey provided for the support of the first troops which were sent in 1861?

Mr. SITGREAVES. Yes, sir.

Mr. STARR. I beg leave to say that that measure was adopted in opposition to the Democratic portion of the Legislature; that we had then an American party in the Legislature, and the Democrats made it a party question upon voting for the appropriation—a strict party question. And the Executive of the State was not in the hands of the Democracy at that time.

Mr. SITGREAVES. Laws were passed by a Democratic Legislature authorizing the raising of bounties for the support of troops, and appropriations were made for the payment of bounties to the families and widowed mothers of the soldiers in the service, and which were promptly paid during the whole war. But the crowning glory of the Democracy of New Jersey was that they provided an asylum in which, at the public expense, the orphan of the soldier is educated and maintained.

And how, sir, did the people respond to these Democratic appeals? Go ask the thirty regiments of infantry and five batteries of artillery, composed of Jerseymen, always in the front, always in the fight. Go read the history of the war, and there see a New Jersey regiment checking the retreat when the army of the Republic ignominiously fled at Bull Run. Go read the list of the dead in the hospitals, and on the battlefield, and in rebel prisons. Go to the five thousand New Jersey fathers, and ask each of them, "Where is your son, who five years since stood at your hearth-stone in his manly strength, the hope of your declining years?" and he will tell you that he marched to sustain the old flag at the call of the Democracy, and his body, pierced by rebel shot or bayonet, moldered in a bloody grave upon the battle-field. Go to five thousand Jersey mothers, and ask each of them, "Where is your boy, the light of your eye, the love of your heart?" and her answer will be "Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted because they are not."

Sir, it is not only unjust, not only ungenerous to charge the Democracy of New Jersey with unfriendliness to the soldier after all these sacrifices, but, sir, it is cruel. If there is one thing under heaven that Jerseymen are more proud of than another, it is the deeds of her soldier sons; for their deeds are identified with the glory and the history of this great Republic. In the war of the Revolution the militia of New Jersey, in the darkest crisis of that war, were almost the sole support of the standard of Washington; and they sustained that standard in many hard-fought conflicts from the hour that the battle-fires of the Revolution were kindled at Lexington, until it waved in final and glorious triumph over the heights of Yorktown. In the second war of Independence, the war with Great Britain in 1812, they were true to the old flag.

While some thought it unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at our victories, the Democracy of New Jersey rejoiced at the success of our arms. They burnt their blue-lights, too, in front of the enemy; but their blue-lights were the smoke of their cannon and the flash of their bayonets. In the war with Mexico, while some prayed that our boys might be greeted with bloody hands and hospitable graves, the New Jersey Democracy were true to that flag and gave it material and moral aid until it floated over the halls of the Montezumas. Wherever that old flag is waved, wherever it floats, in the camp or over the deck, there Jerseymen and Jersey Democrats have ever been found, and I trust in God ever will be, to maintain its honor or to die in its defense.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of this bill has been lengthy and the arguments have been ample. I should not feel it necessary at this time to occupy the attention of the House on the subject, but for the fact that my native State, during the course of this debate, has been alluded to. My colleague from the fourth district [Mr. KELLEY] has stated to you here that prior to 1838 negroes were allowed the privilege of the elective franchise in the State of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has told the truth in that particular, but he has failed to tell the whole truth. Sir, is he not aware that a judicial decision has been made in Pennsylvania upon this very point? Pennsylvania abolished slavery on the 1st of March, 1780, and ever since that period her legislation has tended to ameliorate the condition of that race; but at the same time her legislation, and the position of parties in that State, have uniformly recognized a distinction between the two races. Our constitution of 1790 contained the word "freemen," and under that provision of the constitution, negroes claimed the right to vote in Pennsylvania, and I believe it is well authenticated that they did vote. But, sir, at the October election in 1835, in the county of Luzerne, a negro applied to vote; the inspectors of the election conducting the polls denied him the right to vote, and his vote was rejected, whereupon a suit was instituted and a decision given in his favor in the lower court, and that decision was overruled by the supreme court in 1837. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Gibson, and his opinions are fully known to every lawyer in this House; he stands as a jurist at the head. The opinion of the court was unanimous, concurred in by four other gentlemen of almost equal talent and reputation with himself. The question turned upon the word "freeman," whether it meant a citizen and entitled him to vote. That decision of the court, while it was unanimous, was also clear on the point of declaring that the word "freeman" meant white men and not black men, and that consequently black men were not entitled to vote under the constitution of 1790.

The question was further agitated until a convention met in January, 1838. My distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was a member of that convention, and if I misstate anything that there occurred he can correct me. This question was agitated there, and in order to set the matter at rest and have no further equivocal language in the constitution, the word "white" was inserted by a vote of nearly two thirds, after a lengthy and one of the most intellectual discussions that has ever taken place in any public body in Pennsylvania. So much for the right of the negro to vote in Pennsylvania. I thought it necessary, in answer to the statement of my colleague that negroes voted in Pennsylvania, to give the true and correct history, both judicial and political.

My colleague stated further that it was the Democratic party which adopted that amendment to the constitution and deprived the negro of the right to vote in that convention. I am glad to say, from my reading and from my associations with the party, that the Democratic party of Pennsylvania have uniformly been against extending the right of suffrage to the negro race.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not understand my colleague to deny that colored men were voters at the foundation of the Government, and thence down to 1835. Do I rightly understand him?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not deny that some colored people in Pennsylvania voted down to the year 1835. But I say that according to the judgment of the court they voted illegally, when they had no right to vote.

Mr. KELLEY. In other words, that in 1835 we had a Dred Scott decision in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It was no fabulous or made-up case at all, but a case upon the facts.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Dred Scott case was a fabulous case?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I used the terms so familiar to the gentleman and the party to which he belongs, who constantly call that a fabulous and made-up case. I am not going to be led into a discussion of the Dred Scott decision at this time. I desired to refer the gentleman to the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania; and he cannot escape from it.

Now, as to the gentleman's allegation that it was the Democratic party who took away from and deny to the colored people the right to vote. Sir, that party have always had the cooperation and the aid of vast numbers of the other party. The convention which met in 1838 elected, as its presiding officer, Hon. John Sergeant. It was a Whig convention; its organization was Whig; yet two thirds of that convention voted to insert in the constitution of Pennsylvania the word "white," and I can give the gentleman additional authority, such authority as he has heretofore usually regarded as wise. I allude to the gentleman who is now the attorney general of Pennsylvania, Hon. William L. Meredith. He spoke in that convention; and for the purpose of edifying my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] I will read one or two extracts from his speech there. He says, in the course of his remarks:

"He was willing to extend political rights as far as he could, with reference to the happiness, well-being, and security of society. But he had doubts as to the propriety of admitting the colored people into our political family on the footing of others."

Now, is not that sound authority for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] my colleague? Mr. Meredith is the leviathan, so to speak, of the Pennsylvania bar. Again, he says:

"There is something peculiar in the relation in which the colored race stand to the whites, which renders a distinction inevitable. It has been said that it is enough to show a man is a citizen to show that he has the right of suffrage. This is not the case. The white man who has not paid a tax, or who is a minor, or who has not been assessed, is not the less a citizen, not the less entitled to protection, yet he is not permitted to exercise the right of suffrage."

Furthermore, let me say to the gentleman that he is seeking to do that here, upon the people of this District, which he failed to make an issue at home. He claims the power to force upon the people of this District negro suffrage. But why does he claim the power to do this here when he fails to make the same issue in his own district?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is slightly mistaken there. When I was quite a young man, and somewhat active in the Democratic party, I united with others in petitioning the Legislature of my State to initiate a change of the constitution so that every man who was not a pauper or a felon could be a citizen in the full enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship; and I have not a constituent, whether he belongs to my party or that of the gentleman, who does not know that I plead the cause of justice and right, and advocate the extension of suffrage to every tax-paying adult male citizen who has not been convicted of crime.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has informed me what his record is. But I want to know whether his action during the last canvass was in favor of negro suffrage? And I want to know if he is willing to answer the question, whether he is willing to go before his constituents at the next election upon that issue? I pause for a reply.

Mr. KELLEY. If there be in my district a house into which I have not put a copy of my remarks on negro suffrage, and the gentleman will give me the name of the proprietor, I will send him one. I mean that every man in the district shall know just where I stand, and that I am anxious to give every laboring man the right and power to protect the interests of labor at the ballot-box.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir, the gentleman is willing that every man in his district shall know that he is in favor of imposing negro suffrage upon people that he has no interest in or connection with, that he has no right to represent, except through the agency of the Constitution. But, sir, will he go before his constituents and advocate a proposition to strike out the word "white" from the constitution of Pennsylvania? I appeal to the history of the party in Pennsylvania to which the majority here belong. The distinguished gentleman at the head of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] reported the Republican platform for Pennsylvania, and I ask whether negro suffrage formed any part of that platform?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman says I am willing to impose negro suffrage upon people here in the District whom I have no right to represent.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I said "except through the agency of the Constitution."

Mr. KELLEY. That excepts the whole case. I was going to refer to our constitutional duty, for I have supposed that under the Constitution it was made the duty of Congress to legislate, and not only to legislate, but that it should exclusively legislate for the District.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I admit all that. And yet in the face of the expression of opinion such as we have had here in the District, almost unanimous, and with a vote larger, except in a few instances, than has ever been before polled in this city, we find the gentleman voting to force negro suffrage upon the people of this District, and failing to take any steps to give the same right to the people whom he directly represents, the colored portion of the people of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] whether any steps can now be taken on that subject, or whether the constitution of Pennsylvania does not provide that it shall be amended only once in five years? And whether it was not amended so as to let our soldiers vote two years ago, to the great disgust of the Democratic party?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; the constitution of Pennsylvania provides that the step toward procuring an amendment to that constitution shall be taken at a certain period; and that is the step which I wish to see my colleague have the boldness to take in reference to this question of negro suffrage.

Mr. KELLEY. Which step the gentleman will find me ready to take as soon as time opens the door which is now barred against the movement.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman whether, when the Republican party adopted its platform at Harrisburg last fall, that was not the time to declare the true intent of that party on this question of negro suffrage. I know that, when it was affirmed, during that campaign by the Democratic orators, that the true intention of the Republican party was to introduce negro suffrage, the charge was vehemently denied. That cunning politician, Mr. Cessna, the chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, went so far as to issue an address denying that the right of suffrage was a question in the canvass. My colleague fought under the banner of that gentleman, indorsing, I believe, everything that he said.

I desire only that the true history of Pennsylvania and the true history of the now dominant party in that State, in reference to this subject, shall be fairly and fully known. When my colleague affirms that the negroes had the right to vote in Pennsylvania up to the period of the adoption of the constitution of 1838, and that the Democratic party were alone responsible for depriving them of that right, I desire that he shall exhibit all the facts, so that this House may understand the whole case, not merely a part of it.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that I did not advocate colored suffrage during the last canvass in Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did not hear every speech that the gentleman made; but I read the reports of very many of them, and I never heard or saw anything in his speeches in reference to that.

Mr. KELLEY. It may be that the gentleman did not read it in the newspapers; but let him inquire in all the counties in which I spoke, from the Delaware to Lake Erie, and it was in a majority of the counties on that long line, and he will not find a man, woman, or child who heard me who will not tell him that I advocated colored suffrage.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask, Mr. Speaker, why the gentleman's party did not put that principle in the platform. Acting with that party, the gentleman was talking one way and looking another, like the boy in the boat, who looked one way and rowed another. The party with which the gentleman acted wanted to gull the people, their orators saying in one place that they were in favor of negro suffrage, and in another place declaring that they were against it. I admit that in northwestern Pennsylvania some of the advocates of that party threw down the gauntlet, and raised the question of negro suffrage directly; but in every other part of Pennsylvania they ignored that question.

Mr. KELLEY. I will only remind the gentleman that the twentieth and twenty-fourth wards of Philadelphia are not in northwestern Pennsylvania; and in both of those wards I advocated colored suffrage, apparently very acceptably to the people.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have given the gentleman an opportunity to answer my question, and I have answered every question which he has propounded to me. I now desire to ask him whether he is in favor of amending the constitution of Pennsylvania by striking out the word "white" in the clause defining the qualifications of electors.

Mr. KELLEY. I reply to the gentleman that I am in favor of striking out that word "white" as soon as the constitution will permit. I have a high regard for Franklin, Benezet, and the men who with them laid the foundations of our Government and gave to the English language one of the grandest things in its literature, the preamble to the act of 1780, by which Pennsylvania, in the midst of the war of the Revolution, gave to the world the first example of the members of a ruling class, in gratitude to God for blessings bestowed on them, conferring freedom and citizenship upon their slaves. I had rather, sir, pass my life in humble privacy, surrounded and sustained by the spirits of those good and great men, than have the multitude shouting applause for my efforts in a bad cause in the Halls of Congress, or elsewhere.

I am for so enforcing the provisions of the Constitution of the United States that its interpretation and application shall be in accordance with what I believe Washington and Madison to have understood it to express. I do not wish to impose upon South Carolina and Mississippi what I am not ready to adopt in Pennsylvania; and as the Constitution confides the election of members of Congress to those who have the right to vote for the lower House of the Legislature, I believe it has also the power to decide who shall vote for the lower House of the Legislature. Therefore, sir, I hope we will pass a law defining who shall vote for the lower House of a Legislature in each and every State of the Union. That will settle all our difficulties, and thenceforth armed rebellion will be impossible.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have extended an opportunity to the gentleman to make this addition to his speech. However, I desire that the poison shall have the antidote to follow it. On the question of negro suffrage I shall vote in accordance with what I find to be the uniform opinion of my State, without regard to party. I believe that the races are distinct, "inevitably distinct," in the language of Mr. Meredith; and believing that, I am unwilling to take any step in this Congress which will place that inferior race upon an equality with the white men of the country.

I will go as far as any gentleman, allowing to the colored people all the thrift and happiness which may come from intellectual culture; but when it comes to giving them the power to govern the white men in certain localities then I am against it. I am against anything which looks to the social and political equality of the white and black races. Therefore I shall vote against the present bill.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on the proposition now before the House, I desire to state the reasons that will influence me in my action.

Although the bill only goes to the extent of granting the right of the elective franchise to the people of color in the District of Columbia, in its effect it is of interest to the whole people of my State, and, in the principle which it involves, of importance to the whole country.

While I deny the right or the power of Congress to legislate on this subject, where that legislation is to affect the qualification of electors of any of the States, I at the same time concede the power to pass laws for the good government of this District; and hence, on this or any kindred subject, by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, power is given to Congress—

"To exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."

And the Legislature of Maryland, by the second section of the act of December 19, 1791, declared and enacted—

"That all that part of the territory called Columbia, shall be, and the same is hereby, acknowledged to be forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution."

It is needless, therefore, for any one, from the opinions I entertain, to deny the power that Congress possesses to pass this law.

But, sir, I am here to deny either the expediency, the wisdom, or the necessity of legislating on this subject at this time, or in relation to this or any other district or territory subject to or under the jurisdiction or control of the Government.

Said Henry Clay in the Senate, in 1850, in addressing that body, on the bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia:

"I have always held that under the language of the Constitution, being an investment in Congress of exclusive legislation over this District in all cases whatever, there existed full and complete power over this whole subject. But in reference to the abolition of slavery in the District, I have maintained, what I now continue to maintain, that while the institution remains in Maryland now, or while it existed in Maryland or Virginia before the retrocession, it would be a gross violation of good faith to exercise this power, though it is fully and completely covered by the language of the Constitution."

Since that speech was made, slavery has not only been abolished by act of Congress in this District, but by the natural results of this great rebellion, and the adoption of the constitutional amendment, throughout the length and breadth of this land. I thank God to-day that such has been the result, and that from the Atlantic to the Pacific no slave treads the soil of our free country.

And yet, while I rejoice at this, I cannot but believe that the efforts now put forth by some in this House to force negro political equality in this District is not only, in the language of Henry Clay, "a gross violation of good faith" toward the people of this District and of the State of Maryland, but is the beginning of similar efforts to force the States of this Union to adopt negro political equality, without due consideration of all the important bearings of the subject.

I had thought, sir, and so had the Union people of my State, that with the total abolition of slavery all further legislation on that subject would cease, and that at least some respite would be given them to make good the losses of the war, and to repair its devastation, before it was again placed in the political arena, to disturb, to agitate, and to divide. We thought, with the majority here, that slavery was an evil, nay, that it was a curse and a blight; and, although there were many among us who professed to believe in its "divinity," we made up our minds to rid the State of its presence. And we did do it.

We did it at a time and in a manner that, however little credit she may receive for it here, will reflect imperishable honor on her citizens when the acts of this war shall be written by the future impartial historian. Her motive was pure, patriotic; her action self-sacrificing and noble. She did it because it was right, and because she had resolved to tear up by the roots the cursed tree that had produced so much of misery and of woe. It was done in the midst of this great conflict, freely and voluntarily, not by force of Federal bayonets, but by force of public opinion and intense love of country.

This war-offering of the loyalists of Maryland cannot be properly estimated at this time, nor by you of the North and West. You knew nothing of the effects of slavery on the minds of its victims, nor its influence over the political action of men, except from what you had heard and read from others. You were not born where the "institution" had an existence, and you cannot, therefore, properly estimate the degrading effect on the slave, and the tenacity and love with which thousands clung to it because of love of gain, and because they had grown up under it. But we who were born and reared in a slave State, and who received the curses and anathemas of rebel slave-owners because we favored and succeeded in emancipating the negro, know something of this "old sin" of slavery, and are entitled to some consideration for what we have suffered, and some regard for what we have voluntarily and willingly aided in forever abolishing.

Sir, the people of my State, at least that portion of them whom I have the honor to represent, and who have always been true to the Government, and who, in the darkest hours of rebellion, lifted up their hearts in earnest prayer to God in behalf of our country, and sent their sons to the battle-field to maintain and uphold the Union, are opposed to this measure. They see in it, as I do, the first effort to confer political privileges on a class who, although emancipated from slavery, are not at this time competent, by reason of their ignorance, nor qualified, by reason of their former status, to exercise the high and exalted privileges of an elector. It is an attempt to legislate the black man on the same political level with the white—an attempt which even if it succeeded would only show the disparity between the two races, and in the end redound to the permanent injury of the black. It is an attempt to grant universal suffrage and the right to hold office to the negro, not only here but everywhere, and thereby produce as a natural result that "irrepressible conflict" which none but bad men would profit by, and which all good men must deplore.

I do not mean by what I have said that all black men are ignorant and uneducated or incapable of exercising the right of suffrage. What I mean to say is that as a class they are to-day not only ignorant, uneducated, and unfit to exercise this right, but they are not its safe depositaries. I know many of this class whom I would be willing to trust to-day to exercise this right; but the difficulty in making a law to favor them would be in opening wide a door to admit others whom I could not trust, and whom I am satisfied are incapable of comprehending the new relations they would sustain.

However much gentlemen may be disposed to sneer at the opinions of some, that this is a Government of the white man, I appeal to the history of my country to sustain me in the assertion that it was founded by the white race, has grown to power and greatness by and through them, and if republican Government is to live on this continent, it can only live by and through the support and efforts of the white man. I do not desire to intimate that this is a Government exclusively for the whites, nor that it is a Government where the black man is to be ostracized politically on account of his color. I recognize the fact that all men are to-day free and equal; that they are entitled to certain inalienable rights; that among them are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that it is the great end of Government to secure these rights, and that the negro, freed and emancipated, is entitled to the same protection, in these respects, that I, as a white man, am entitled to receive.

Sir, the right of suffrage is a precious right, to be exercised by all who are capable, qualified, and loyal to the Government, and to be extended to none who are incapable by reason of nonage, want of mind, or disloyalty. The right to vote is not a natural-born right, but a gift or franchise conferred by the sovereign power on such of its citizens as are capable of exercising it. Until it is once given, the denial of it is no refusal of the right. When you have once received it, then, and not till then, does it become a right, and the withholding or withdrawal of it, except for good cause, is subversive of one of the fundamental principles of republican government. The sovereign power grants the right when it thinks it would be beneficial to the State; it withholds it or takes it away when it thinks it would be detrimental or destructive to the State. The citizen receives it to be used in the mode prescribed by law until by some act of his own he forfeits it. Hence idiots, lunatics, men convicted of crime, aliens, and in some States rebels, are not allowed to vote; and various conditions and qualifications are added to show that it is a power not to be given to every citizen. Mr. Madison, who has been quoted quite frequently during the debates on this bill, thus speaks in relation to suffrage:

"The right of suffrage is a fundamental article in republican constitutions. The regulation of it is at the same time a task of peculiar delicacy. Allow the right exclusively to property, and the rights of persons may be oppressed. The feudal policy alone sufficiently proves it. Extend it equally to all, and the rights of property or the claims of justice may be overruled by a majority without property or interested in measures of injustice. Of this abundant proof is afforded by other popular Governments; and it is not without examples in our own, particularly in the laws impairing the obligation of contracts."—Madison Papers, vol. 5, p. 580.

John Adams, the second President of the United States, and one of the fathers of the Republic, uses this language:

"Society can be governed only by general rules. Government cannot accommodate itself to every particular case as it happens, nor to the circumstances of particular persons. It must establish general comprehensive regulations for cases and persons. The only question is which general rule will accommodate most cases and most persons."

Depend upon it, sir, it is dangerous to open so fruitful a source of controversy and altercation as would be opened by attempting to alter the qualifications of voters. There will be no end of it. New claims will arise; women will demand a vote; lads from twelve to twenty-one will think their rights not enough attended to; and every man who has not a farthing will demand an equal voice with any other in all acts of State. It tends to confound and destroy all distinctions, and prostrate all ranks to one common level."—Works of John Adams, vol. 3, p. 378.

I have said that it would be unwise, inexpedient, and unnecessary to confer the right at this time on the people of color. It is unwise, because you are about to clothe men with the power of the ballot over one half of whom have been slaves all their lives, and who do not yet fully apprehend the citizenship conferred upon them. It is unwise, because it is universal, and you have no data from which you can form any estimate of the effect it will have over the minds and actions of the uneducated and ignorant contraband, who, although familiarly known as "intelligent," is not of that kind desirable in ruling over the destinies of the capital of the nation. It is unwise, because it is an experiment, an introduction of a new element in the political management of our affairs, which promises to work well, but which might, and I fear will, turn out badly.

It is unnecessary and inexpedient, because a vast majority of the voters of the city of Washington and Georgetown have indicated their preference that the franchise should remain as it is. As property holders and tax-payers their voice should have some influence. If you grant the right, it not only goes to the extent of allowing all the negroes now in the District to vote, but as many thousands more as would flock from all portions of Virginia and Maryland "to see how voting feels," and "to try on" politics for a change. Some would doubtless offer themselves for office; and is it any wonder that the people of Washington should be opposed to such a measure? Is it reasonable to suppose that the tax-payers consider it safer to trust the enacting of their ordinances to a people hitherto oppressed and enslaved for centuries than to their own citizens? Have they discovered that two years of freedom has made the black man as competent to govern as themselves? Since when has the necessity arisen to require a new class of voters to do that to-day what from the time the right to regulate their municipal affairs was intrusted to them has been in the hands of those who at present exercise it? Have the white people of the District abused their trust? Have they shown themselves incompetent to vote, that you want to make another and a larger class to outvote and to govern them? Would it not be better to allow no one to vote in the District than to resort to such a punishment? Since when has it occurred to this House that universal suffrage should be granted in this District? By reference to the proceedings of this House in the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, it will be seen that it was supposed at that time that the white man was good enough to manage the affairs of this city, and that the colored man was not competent, or at least was not thought entitled, to vote, as both the Senate and the House refused it. (McPherson's History of the Rebellion, page 241.)

Mr. Speaker, I am not here as the special advocate of the District of Columbia. From what has been said on this floor, one would suppose that this city was the heaven of traitors. For such of her citizens as are or have been traitors I have as little respect and regard for as any gentleman in this House. I take it that no man who left this District or his State to engage in armed rebellion against his country has any right to make laws for me unless that right be restored to him by the power against which he rebelled. But, sir, there are Union men in this District, I am proud to say, as true and devoted in their love of country as can be found anywhere. For such I have a fellow-feeling. They, like myself, have been born and raised in the South, and are opposed to these measures because they are satisfied it will do no good, and is calculated to do much mischief.

The passage of this bill would be most unjust to the people of my State. I did not suppose that Maryland would be consulted as to the passage of this law; but surely if devoted love to this Union and the efforts put forth by my native State in the cause of human freedom deserve anything, some consideration should at least be shown us before so important a step is irrevocably taken. Maryland gave over forty thousand of her gallant sons to aid you in crushing out this rebellion. Shoulder to shoulder they marched alongside of Massachusetts and Ohio, and left their blood and their bones on every battle-field to attest their devotion. Her treasure was poured out as freely as water in aid of the finances of the Government, while her citizens, individually, contributed largely of their substance to feed and nourish the hungry and fatigued of our brave boys as they marched through our State to and from the Potomac and the Peninsula. They have the same love for the Union now that they had then, and they never will consent to part with it. The political power of the State is to-day in the hands of loyal men, and it will remain there unless injudicious and unwise measures like this divide us. The great body of the Union clement of the State has already spoken out against these measures. Every State and county Union convention that has met since it was agitated has pronounced against it, and the only hope that the rebels of Maryland have got for the future is to attempt to divide us from the great Republican party of the country. We love that party because it has been true to the Union and opposed to human slavery; we love it because it helped to save our State, and because it did not believe "the war to be a failure," nor become disheartened at temporary disaster or defeat.

On last Wednesday the Union Governor of Maryland delivered his annual message. He is a man than whom no one more true to his country nor more devoted to the colored race ever lived. Hear what he speaks as the sentiment of the State:

"The distinctive characteristics and admitted antagonism of the two races cannot be lost sight of in the settlement of these grave issues. In discussing the claim of universal negro suffrage, we must understand, in the very outset, the effect of the measure in its full bearing upon the southern and border States. It matters not, in some of the States, whether the negro is invested with the right to vote or not. The exercise of suffrage causes no disturbance of existing relations. If we admit his right to vote, we cannot justly exclude him from our representative Halls, from the government of our States and cities, and every other privilege known to our laws. The right to vote assumes the exercise of the power thus conferred for the exclusive benefit of his own race. The effect, then, of universal negro suffrage is the virtual transfer of southern States and southern territory, and it may be some of the border States, to the ultimate possession and control of the negro; it is the substitution of the African for the Anglo-Saxon race in a large section of our national domain.

"With the southern and middle States, perhaps our own, this issue of negro suffrage is a subject of the gravest import. Massachusetts, with her nine or ten thousand negroes, in an aggregate population of 1,200,000 souls; Maine, with her 600 in an aggregate of more than 600,000; Vermont, 700 in an aggregate of more than 300,000; New Hampshire, 500 in an aggregate of more than 500,000, and other free States standing in the numerical relation, would hardly claim to approach this issue from a common standpoint, even with our own State. The loyal men of the South, admitted to be ever so limited in number, stand in no relation which would justify, even if the power existed under the Constitution, the forcible surrender of their country into the hands of the African race."

The Lieutenant Governor, an original "uncompensated" emancipationist, and a man who, years ago, was persecuted because he entertained abolition sentiments, thus addresses the Senate of Maryland:

"As citizens of this old State of Maryland we have much to feel proud of, much to thank God for. Upon the very border, with hostile armies surging back and forth over our soil year after year, connected by blood and social ties with those who lifted the arm of rebellion, our faith and loyalty have continued inviolate; and if, during a short reign of terror, the polar star of duty seemed to be hidden from view, it was but the drifting of a cloud over its fair surface, leaving its radiance purer and clearer for the momentary obscuration. No State claims at this hour, or will command in the annals of the future, a prouder record. Not content to yield up her sons a sacrifice upon the altar of the country, she took in advance a step toward the extinction of that fatal cause of contention which culminated in the recent conflict of arms. The first note of freedom went forth from these Halls, proclaiming that within the limits of this old Commonwealth, at least, human bondage should no longer exist. Since then other States have wheeled into line, until it has become morally certain that, if in after years rebellion should ever again lift its hideous front upon American soil, it will find no rallying center upon the question of slavery. With the extinction of this great evil, and the brilliant vista of prosperity which that act opens before us, are presented unfulfilled duties and obligations to the emancipated people within our borders, which we cannot, which we dare not overlook, if we would; the prompt consideration of which is demanded by every principle of humanity, advancing civilization, and an enlightened public opinion. I allude not here to the question of suffrage. However correct the affirmative theory, it is evident that the time for legislation upon this subject has not arrived in this country yet, and certainly not in this State. The problem must be left to work out its own solution. But independent of this are obligations to the colored people of which we must acquit ourselves at once, and which are the logical sequences of emancipation."

Sir, what are the evils we apprehend from the passage of this bill? They are simply the natural results that flow from a new condition of things inaugurated here, and that will inevitably have its effect on the colored people of my State. So soon as emancipation was enacted here, thousands of slaves left the State and came into the District—how many thousand I do not know. Why did they come here? To get free; for no other reason. And mark me well, the same thing will follow the passage of this law. The poor fellows have heard so much talk about voting, that so soon as they hear they can vote in the District we will find them coming by the thousand. And what advantage will it be to them? Simply nothing but to vote. And how in my own State? You will find that the sharp, designing, ambitious negro, and there are a few such, will improve their opportunities by telling them that the white men of Maryland are cheating them of their rights, and incite them to discontent. The result of which will be a bitterness of feeling, and in the end a struggle to obtain the right to vote. Suppose the right is given them, what then? Is there any danger; are they not all loyal; will they not all vote on the side of the Union? Mr. Speaker, I doubt it. I know many loyal negroes, and some who are not loyal. But the negroes as a general thing are the most quiet, passive, lamb-like beings on earth. They will never forget a friend; seldom ever their old masters. Although they are free, many of them will not leave their old homes. Those who have, find homes elsewhere, on the large farms or in the city, and work for wages as laborers. They, in time, will become as much attached to their new employer as they were to him who formerly owned them. All that is required is to treat them kindly, and I venture the assertion—there may be exceptional cases here and there, but as a general thing—the former master or the new employer will, nine cases out of ten, exert more influence in obtaining their vote than all other influences combined. The effect of this will be to give the rebels more influence than they now possess.

Suppose I am wrong in this, and that party will control them, but that they will vote as a class and a race, just as we do. What will be the effect, then?

According to the census of 1860, the aggregate white male population of the State was 256,859; free colored male, 39,746; slave male (free) 44,318; making free colored 84,059 to 256,859 free white.

You will find that the colored population is so unevenly and unequally distributed that in the city of Baltimore, with a white male population of 88,000, there were but 10,000 free male colored, while in Anne Arundel, with a male white population of 6,258, there were free male colored 6,238. The effect of this unequal distribution will be that in some parts of the State the free colored voters will not only possess the balance of power, but will be powerful enough to outvote the whites altogether. The moment this takes place, I fear the negro will be the loser in the conflict for the mastery.

Observe the relative numbers of the two classes as exhibited in the following table:

	Male, white.	Free male, colored.
Calvert county.....	2,044.....	3,237
Caroline county.....	3,914.....	1,758
Charles county.....	2,923.....	5,408
Dorchester county.....	5,923.....	4,155
Kent county.....	3,914.....	3,124
Montgomery county.....	5,891.....	3,488
Prince George's county.....	4,853.....	7,114
Queen Anne county.....	4,420.....	3,839
St. Mary's county.....	3,472.....	4,247
Talbot county.....	4,005.....	3,392

Compare, sir, these statistics with the average white males and colored males in other States, and you will find why gentlemen from the North and West are not influenced by the same motives and causes that influence me, and why I can disagree with them and not be classed with the enemies of the negro. In Maine the population is divided thus: male, white, 316,530; free male, colored, 659, distributed among sixteen counties; and the highest number of male colored in any county is 212; and in this county (Cumberland) there are 36,950 male whites.

New Hampshire has a white male population of 159,563. She has a free male colored population of 253, divided up into ten counties; and the greatest number in any one county is 67. That county (Merrimack) has 20,306 white males.

Vermont has 158,415 white males, and 371 free male colored. The greatest number of male colored in any one county is 78, and that county (Rutland) has 18,267 male whites.

Rhode Island has 82,302 white males, and 1,831 free male colored, distributed among five counties; and the highest number of male colored in any one county is in Providence, which has 898 to 51,000 male whites.

Massachusetts has 592,244 white males and 4,409 free male colored, distributed among four counties; and the highest number of blacks in any one county is in Suffolk, where the proportion is 91,055 white males to 1,089 free colored males.

New York has 1,910,354 male whites to 23,178 male colored; Pennsylvania, 1,427,945 male whites to 26,373 male colored; Ohio, 1,171,720 male whites to 18,442 male colored; and so you may continue throughout the whole catalogue, and you will find the same disproportion in favor of the whites in the North and West. But, sir, it is useless for me to say further on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I do not desire my action on this bill, or the votes I shall give on those of similar importance, to be misconstrued, either by this House or the country. Some may suppose that because I am not in favor of negro suffrage, I am an enemy to the negro. Sir, I am not his enemy, but his friend, and shall continue to be his friend so long as he continues to merit my friendship. I enlisted in the cause of emancipation in my State at a time when, to be an emancipationist, was to be hated and despised by many of my best and warmest friends. I have stood true and steadfast with these parties, and intend to remain with them so long as they represent the true Union sentiment of my State. I shall vote for no measure or connect myself with any party that would either deprive the black man of what he already has or that would oppose the conferring upon him all the rights necessary and essential in securing to him life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the enjoyment of the fruits of his own labor. I am neither disposed to "take a step backward" nor to pull down what for four years I have been aiding, in my humble way, to build up.

The negro is free. I will do all in my power to make his freedom a blessing to him and to us. As a freeman, he is entitled to acquire and dispose of real and other property, to labor and receive the avails and proceeds of his labor, to have his life, liberty, and person protected by the same laws that protect me. I am in favor of the passage and enforcement of such laws as will carry out those objects. I will go further, and say that as he shall have the right to contract, so shall he not only have the right to enforce his contract, but to that end shall be received as a witness in a court of justice on the same terms, and subject to the same laws as are binding on us. It would be an outrage, a shame on the American people of to-day, if, after they had freed these poor unfortunate beings, and had placed them among those who have offered their freedom where they are compelled to work out their own redemption, and to earn their own livelihood, we were to refuse to throw around them such legal guards as will prove their only protection and secure to them the enforcement of their rights.

I will go even further than this, and will vote for all measures to elevate their condition, and to educate them separate and apart from the whites, so that they may not only properly appreciate the freedom they now have, but become fitted to exercise the higher duties of freemen whenever the dominant race see proper to confer such privileges upon them hereafter. In all this I conceive I act the part of the philanthropist, and no less the friend of my own than of the black race. In refusing at this time to give him the right to vote, I consider that I act none the less as his friend. I have no hatred, no prejudice to the negro. I am willing to confer upon him everything necessary and essential to his well-being and his future happiness and usefulness, but when it comes to placing him upon the same social and political level as my own race, I must refuse to do it, because in doing it I would be doing an injury to both races that the future at least will develop.

If I believed that the matter of suffrage was the only mode to help the negro in his elevation, and the only safeguard to his protection, or guarantee to his rights, I would be willing to give it to him now, subject to proper qualifications and restrictions. But I am honest in my conviction that, uneducated and ignorant as he is, a slave from his birth, and subject to the will and caprice of his master, with none of the exalted ideas of what that privilege means, and with but a faint conception of the true position he now occupies, the negro is not the proper subject to have conferred upon him this right. I believe if it is given to him, that in localities where his is the majority vote, parties will spring up, each one bidding higher than the other for his ballot, and that in the end the negro-voting element will be controlled by a few evil and wicked politicians, and as something to be bought and sold as freely as an article of merchandise. I am satisfied of another fact, from my experience of the southern negro, that if they are ever allowed to vote the shrewd politician of the South, who has been formerly his master, will exert more influence over his vote than all the exhortations from Beecher or Cheever.

It is a notorious fact that the southern planter maintained his political influence over the poor white man of the South, because the poor white man was dependent on him for his living and support. And you will find, when it is too late, that the southern planter will maintain the same political influence over the poor, uneducated, ignorant, and dependent African, even to a greater extent than he formerly exercised over what used to be called the "poor white trash."

Mr. Speaker, let us not, because we have the majority here to-day, pass upon measures, which, if we were evenly divided, we would hesitate to pass. Let us not, because we are called radicals, strike at the roots of society, and of the great social and political systems that have existed for over a century, and attempt to do in a day without any preparation, what to do well and safely will require years of patience on the part of the freedmen, and earnest, honest, exertions to elevate, improve, and educate on our part. Let us look at this question as statesmen, not as partisans. Let us not suppose that the parties of to-day will have a perpetual existence, and that because the negro, freed and emancipated by us, would naturally vote on the side of his deliverer to-day, that it is any guarantee, when new parties are formed and a competition arises, that the whole or the major part of his vote will be cast on the right side. White men and black men are liable to the same infirmities.

Let us rather, sir, rejoice at what has been already done for him, and be content to watch his future. Let us help to elevate and improve him, not only in education, but in morals. Let us see to it that he is not only protected in all his rights of person and of property, but let us insist that the amplest guarantees shall be given. Let us wait until the great problem the African is now working out has been finished, and we find that he thoroughly comprehends and will not abuse what he has got, before we attempt to confer other privileges, which, when once granted, can never be taken from him. Sir, let it not be forgotten that "revolutions never go backward;" and if you ever confer this right on the negro, and find it will not work well, that you have been too hasty, that you should have waited awhile longer, you will find it is too late, and that, once having possessed it, they will not part with it except with their lives.

Mr. DARLING obtained the floor.

CONFIDENCE IN THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a correction of the Journal of the House. On the 10th of January, I had the honor to submit a resolution in reference to the policy of the President, and a mistake has occurred in its engrossment. I ask that the resolution may be read as I offered it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House cherish the most entire confidence in the patriotism and ability of the President of the United States and in his desire to restore the Union on a basis of permanent prosperity and peace, and that the cooperation of this House is pledged to him in support of the general policy of reconstruction inaugurated by him in the modes authorized by the Constitution and consistent with the security of republican institutions.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be observed that in the printed resolution the language is changed, and it becomes a resolution declaring that this House cherish the most entire confidence in the patriotism and policy of the President. I did affirm by the resolution that we cherish entire confidence in the patriotism and ability of the President, and in the general policy which he proposes to inaugurate. But I did not intend to commit myself nor to commit this House to a declaration of confidence in every measure or act of the President in reconstruction, and I do not wish to go out before the country as saying that in everything the President has done, he has done what I would have done or what I can conscientiously in all things approve. I did not approve entirely and in all things the policy of the late President. There were things which I regretted; and I only say that I do not wish now to commit myself in advance by so broad a declaration as is set forth in the resolution as it was incorrectly printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in response to the gentleman from New York, that he entertains this as a privileged question, as there certainly was a mistake in the printing. As written it reads "patriotism and ability," and it is printed "patriotism and policy."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DARLING,] I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and thereupon (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received the credentials of Hon. William A. Graham, of North Carolina, showing that he was elected a Senator of the United States from that State for six years from the 4th of March last; and, in compliance with the previous practice of the Senate in such cases, these credentials will be received, if there be no objection, and laid upon the table. They are laid upon the table.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, information in relation to the number of major and brigadier generals of volunteers, where they are stationed, and what duties they are performing; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, information in relation to the number of men now in service in the regular Army, what number of officers are holding commissions, where said officers are stationed, and what duty they are performing; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented two petitions of soldiers who volunteered and enlisted in the service of the United States for the term of nine months in the autumn of 1862, praying that a bounty of twenty five dollars, which at that time they allege they had reason to expect, be paid to them; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a petition from the members of the African Methodist Zion church, of the borough of York, in Pennsylvania, setting forth that in many of the States at this moment no such thing as a republican form of government exists, and praying Congress to grant a remedy for that case. I also offer a similar petition from the Past Grand Master's Council No. 2, of the Patriarchal Order of Past Grand Masters of the Grand United Order of Odd Fellows, praying Congress to secure a republican form of government in certain States. I ask the reference of these petitions to the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction.

They were so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a petition of fifty-seven colored men of the city of Montgomery, Alabama, in which they remonstrate against a requisition recently made by the Governor of Alabama on the United States for arms and ammunition to equip one hundred and four companies of militia. They set forth the danger to which the colored people will be exposed in their persons and property by the arming of two militia companies in every county of the State. There is no pretext, they say, even that there is any danger to the public peace to be apprehended from the colored people of the State. I must say, in presenting this petition, which is both a petition and a remonstrance, that I sympathize with it entirely, and I protest against the militia of Alabama being armed at this moment at the expense of the national Government. I move the reference of this petition to the joint committee of fifteen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT presented the memorial of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co., praying for compensation for damages alleged to have been sustained by them in consequence of the suspension of the work on the dome of the Capitol in May, 1861, by order of the Secretary of War; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Charles H. Upton, praying for compensation for alleged damages to his property in Fairfax and Alexandria counties, Virginia, by United States troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of the members of the bar of the State and district of Kansas, praying for an increase of the salary of the United States district judge for that district; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of colored citizens of Colorado Territory, remonstrating against the admission of that Territory as a State until the word "white" be erased from its constitution, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 22) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Graves, late a private in the ninth regiment of Rhode Island volunteers, praying to be allowed an invalid pension, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Bridget Stone, widow of John Stone, praying to be allowed arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Frances S. Richardson, widow of the late Major General I. B.

Richardson, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 34) in relation to the qualifications of jurors and to writs of error in certain cases, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLARK. The same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 14) in relation to the qualifications of jurors in certain cases, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the matter being provided for in the bill just reported.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Anderson, praying to be allowed arrears of pension, reported a bill (S. No. 79) for the benefit of Peter Anderson; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the United States Pacific squadron, praying that he may be relieved from all responsibility for the loss of the public funds occasioned by robbery while on duty in Panama, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print one hundred thousand copies of the late message of the President of the United States on the condition of the States lately in rebellion, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That one hundred thousand copies of the late message of the President on the condition of the States lately in rebellion, with the reports of Lieutenant General Grant and Major General Carl Schurz, and the letters annexed thereto, be printed for distribution.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was to strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

MEXICAN FRONTIER.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any letters from Major General Sheridan, commanding the military division of the Gulf, or from any other officer of the department of Texas, in regard to the condition of affairs on the southwestern frontier of the United States, and especially in regard to any violation of neutrality on the part of the army now occupying the right bank of the Rio Grande.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 81) ceding to the State of West Virginia the lands and tenements, with the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereunto pertaining, belonging to the United States, and lying and being in the county of Jefferson, at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLEY. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the Senator if the bill does not relate to the army grounds at Harper's Ferry? If it does, it seems to me that the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I understand they are now attempting to reestablish the armory at that place, and the bill would seem to be more immediately connected with military affairs than with public lands.

Mr. WILLEY. I had some difficulty as to what committee the bill ought to be referred to. I have no objection to its taking the direction indicated by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is clearly a question for them to determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia so modify his motion?

Mr. WILLEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, if there be no objection.

SAN FRANCISCO LAND CLAIM.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate what, if any, interest the United States have in the prosecution of the case of "The United States versus The city of San Francisco," and also to give the Senate full and detailed information as to who are interested in the success of the United States in said case, including the full names of the parties, and each of them, with the nature of their claims, and how and from whom derived.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Let it lie over until tomorrow. I want to reflect on it.

Mr. STEWART. I think the Senator will have no objection to it. It is a simple inquiry as to who are the parties prosecuting an appeal in behalf of the United States. Strange circumstances are connected with it, and I should like to have the matter inquired into. The appeal is prosecuted in the name of the United States.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Very well.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GENERAL GRANT'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of Lieutenant General Grant, already ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be furnished to the Lieutenant General.

This does not increase the number of copies, but merely diverts a portion of them from the Senate to the Lieutenant General, which is at the request of his department. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 40) directing the Secretary of War to postpone the sale of public property at Point Lookout, Maryland, and a bill (H. R. No. 84) to regulate the times and places of holding the district court of the United States within and for the district of Maine; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up, with a view of having it brought before the Senate, bill No. 67, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator whether he intends to put that bill on its passage to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have it read so as to bring it before the Senate fairly, and then I shall not press it to a vote. I merely wish to have some progress made with it.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 67) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported a substitute for the bill, and it will not be necessary to read the original bill; I propose to have the substitute read merely. The Committee on Military Affairs unanimously agreed to report it as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be dispensed with unless called for by some member, and the reading of the words proposed to be inserted by way of amendment will be read.

The amendment was read. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following as a substitute:

That the military peace establishment of the United States shall hereafter consist of five regiments of artillery, twelve regiments of cavalry, fifty-five regiments of infantry, and such other forces as shall be provided for by this act, to be known as the Army of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the five regiments of artillery provided for by this act shall consist of the five regiments now organized; and the first, second, third, and fourth regiments of artillery shall have the same organization as is now provided by law for the fifth regiment of artillery.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That to the six regiments of cavalry now in service there shall be added six regiments, having the same organization as is now provided by law for cavalry regiments, the first and second lieutenants of which, and two thirds of the officers above the grade of first lieutenant, shall be selected from among the officers of volunteer cavalry who have served two years during the war, and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field: Provided, That four of these additional regiments may be armed and drilled as infantry at the discretion of the President.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be fifty-five regiments of infantry, to consist of the ten regiments of ten companies each now organized; the nine remaining regiments so distributed that each battalion, with the addition of two companies, shall constitute a regiment of ten companies, and all the vacancies in the grades of first and second lieutenant, and two thirds of the vacancies in the grades above that of first lieutenant shall be filled by selection from among the officers of volunteer infantry or artillery who have served two years during the war, and have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field; ten regiments to be composed of colored men, to be officered by officers of colored troops, who have served two years during the war, and who have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field; and eight regiments to be composed of men who have been wounded, or discharged from service on account of disease contracted in the line of duty, the officers of which shall be selected from the Veteran Reserve corps, or other officers of volunteers who have been disabled in service: Provided, That promotions in the colored regiments, and in the regiments of disabled men hereby authorized, shall be confined to the regiments of the corps.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the volunteer officers to be selected for appointment, under the provisions of this act, shall be distributed as nearly as may be among the States, in proportion to the number of troops furnished during the war.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each regiment of infantry provided for by this act shall have one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, one adjutant (an extra lieutenant), one quartermaster, (an extra lieutenant), ten captains, ten first and ten second lieutenants, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, one commissary sergeant, and ten companies, and each company shall have one captain, one first and one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, four sergeants, eight corporals, two musicians, one wagoner, and forty-eight privates, and the number of privates may be increased to eighty-two, at the discretion of the President, whenever the exigencies of the service require such increase.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That each regiment in the service of the United States may have a band, as now provided by law.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the Army shall hereafter be for the term of five years, and no officers shall be appointed to any regiment or company until the minimum number of men shall have been enlisted, and the command duly organized.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one lieutenant general, five major generals, and ten brigadier generals, who shall have the same pay and emoluments, and be entitled to the same staff officers in number and grade as now provided by law.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the adjutant general's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely: one adjutant general with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; four assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and thirteen assistant adjutant generals with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That there shall be four inspectors general of the Army, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry, and five assistant inspectors general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one assistant judge advocate general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the said Judge Advocate General and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded, the proceedings of the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and shall perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the armies of the United States.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the quartermaster general's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; six assistant quartermaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; twelve deputy quartermaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; twenty quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emol-uments of majors of cavalry; and forty-eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry, and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the number of military storekeepers shall hereafter be as many as shall be required, not exceeding sixteen, with the same compensation as is now provided by law.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, approved July 4, 1864, shall continue in force so far as they do not become obsolete and unnecessary upon the disbandment of the volunteer forces.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the subsistence department shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely, one commissary general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That officers of the line, detailed to act as regimental quartermasters or commissaries, or as quartermasters or commissaries of permanent posts, or of commands of not less than two companies, shall, when the assignment is duly reported to and approved by the War Department, receive, as extra compensation while responsible for Government property, ten dollars per month.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the medical department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one surgeon general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; one assistant surgeon general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; seventy-five surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; one hundred and fifty assistant surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry after three years' service, and with the rank, pay, and emoluments of first lieutenants of cavalry for the first three years' service; and five medical storekeepers, with the same compensation as is now provided by law; and the vacancies hereby created in the grades of surgeon and assistant surgeon shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have served as staff and regimental surgeons or assistant surgeons of volunteers two years during the war; and persons who have served as assistant surgeons three years in the volunteer service shall be eligible for promotion to the grade of captain.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, the Secretary of War may detail a surgeon as chief medical purveyor, who, while performing such duty, shall be in charge of the principal purchasing and issuing depot of medical supplies, and shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, and not to exceed five medical officers as assistant medical purveyors, who, while performing such duty in the different geographical divisions or departments, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the Surgeon General be, and he is hereby, empowered to detail from time to time, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, not to exceed five officers of the grade of surgeon for duty as medical inspectors, who, while performing such duties, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry, and who shall receive their instructions from and make their reports direct to the Surgeon General.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the pay department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one paymaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two deputy paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, and sixty paymasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of major shall be filled by selection from the persons who have served as additional paymasters two years during the war.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the corps of engineers shall consist of one chief engineer, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, four colonels, ten lieutenant colonels, twenty majors, thirty captains, and thirty first and ten second lieutenants, who shall have the pay and emoluments now provided by law for officers of the engineer corps.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed in the corps of engineers, by selection from among the officers of that corps, four inspectors of fortifications and other engineer operations, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of engineers, but the number of officers of said corps as heretofore established by law shall not be increased thereby.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the five companies of engineer soldiers, and the sergeant major, and quartermaster heretofore prescribed by law, shall constitute a battalion of engineers, to be officered by officers of suitable rank detailed from the corps of engineers, and the officers of engineers acting respectively as adjutant and quartermaster of this battalion shall be entitled to the pay and emoluments of adjutants and quartermasters of cavalry.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That in the organization of each of the companies of engineer soldiers there shall be made a reduction of twenty enlisted men, to be apportioned equally among the two classes of privates, but in time of war the President may, at his discretion, restore the present organization of these companies.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the ordnance department of the Army shall consist of the same number of officers and enlisted men as is now authorized by law, and the officers shall be of the following grades, namely, one brigadier general, three colonels, fifteen lieutenant colonels, eight majors, twenty captains, fifteen first lieutenants, nine second lieutenants, and thirteen military storekeepers, all of whom shall have the same pay and emoluments as now provided by law.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one chief signal officer of the Army, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. And the Secretary of War shall have power to detail from the Army, upon the recommendation of the chief signal officer, such number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates as may be deemed necessary for the efficient performance of signal duty: Provided, That no officer or enlisted man shall be detailed to serve in the signal corps until he shall have been examined and approved by a military board, to be convened by the Secretary of War for that purpose; and officers, while so detailed, shall receive the pay and emoluments of cavalry officers of their respective grades; and enlisted men, while so detailed, shall receive the pay of engineer soldiers of similar grade, and shall, when deemed necessary, be mounted upon horses provided by the Government.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That no officer of the regular Army below the rank of a field officer shall hereafter be promoted to a higher grade hereafter having passed a satisfactory examination as to his fitness for promotion, before a board of three officers of his corps or arm of service, senior to him in rank; and should the officer fail at said examination, he shall be suspended from promotion for one year, when he shall be reexamined, and upon a second failure shall be dropped from the rolls of the Army: Provided, That if any officer be found unfit for promotion on account of moral disqualifications, he shall not be entitled to a reexamination.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That the Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General of Subsistence, Surgeon General, Paymaster General, Chief of Engineers, and Chief of Ordnance, shall hereafter be appointed by selection from the corps to which they belong.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be appointed to any vacancy created by this act in the pay, medical, or quartermaster's departments, until he shall have passed the examination now required by law.

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That no persons shall be commissioned in any of the regiments authorized by this act until they shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board, to be convened under direction of the Secretary of War, which shall inquire into the services rendered during the war, capacity, and qualifications of the applicants; and such appointments, when made, shall be without regard to previous rank, but with sole regard to qualifications and meritorious services.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That persons applying for commissions in any of the regiments authorized by this act shall not be entitled to any compensation for expenses incurred in reporting to the board for examination.

SEC. 33. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WILSON. I called up the bill for the purpose of having it read and securing the attention of members to it. I do not propose to take any further action upon it this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one matter, in regard to which an officer has spoken to me this morning. I wish to ascertain whether the construction put by this officer upon the fourth section is correct. That section provides that the colored troops shall be officered by officers of colored regiments who have served two years during the war. The construction put upon it by the officer to whom I allude is that that requires the service to have been in colored regiments.

Mr. WILSON. It does not. The original bill might have been interpreted in that way, but it has been so amended as to avoid that construction. It provides that those officers shall have served two years during the war—not two years in the colored regiments, but two years during the war in white or colored regiments.

Mr. SHERMAN. But they must be officers of colored regiments at the time they are appointed?

Mr. WILSON. It means two years' service in white or colored regiments. To require two years' service in colored regiments would shut out many of the best officers now in those regiments.

Mr. HARRIS. Can officers be taken who have never served in colored regiments?

Mr. WILSON. The appointments in these colored regiments are to be from officers who have served in colored regiments. There are about two hundred of those regiments; we propose to take officers in those regiments, but not requiring the two years' service to have been wholly there, and to have promotions in the colored regiments as if they formed a separate corps.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the Senator from Massachusetts does not intend to go further with the bill to-day, although it is a little in advance of the hour fixed for other business, I move that it be postponed, and that the Senate take up the joint resolution which was introduced by my colleague, and which by his courtesy and the courtesy of the Senate was postponed until to-day at one o'clock for the purpose of allowing me to express my views upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion against the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Howe to refer the resolution to the joint committee of the two Houses to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask that the resolution be read at the desk.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas the people of Virginia, of North Carolina, of South Carolina, of Georgia, of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee have heretofore declared their independence of the Government of the United States, have usurped authority denied to every State by the supreme law of the land, have abjured duties imposed upon every State by the same law, and have waged war against the United States, whereby the political functions formerly granted to those people have been suspended; and whereas such functions cannot yet be restored to those people with safety to themselves or to the nation; and whereas military tribunals are not suited to the exercise of civil authority: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That local governments ought to be provisionally organized forthwith for the people in each of the districts named in the preamble hereto.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, how many States constitute that great Republic which the world calls the United States of America? The President and those who think with him say thirty-six. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and my colleague say twenty-five. Where are the eleven? Where is Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, Florida, and Texas? These eleven great States are larger, by thousands of square miles, than England, France, Spain, Portugal, and the Germanic Confederation, including Austria and Prussia, all put together, as the table I hold in my hand shows:

These eleven great States, with ten million people, which produced, annually, four million bales of cotton, and are capable of producing double that number, where are they, and what are they? That they once constituted a part of the States of this Union is certain. Do they now? That is the question. President Lincoln, during his administration, and President Johnson, and those who sustain their policy, say they do. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who oppose that policy, and, to my sincere regret, my colleague, say they do not.

Before giving my views, I will notice what is sometimes said, that this question, namely, whether they are States in the Union under the Constitution, or are Territories, is a mere abstraction—an idea of no practical importance. While I yield to none in the desire to secure practical good and avoid practical evil, I cannot forget that ideas rule the world. They are the spiritual forces which bring on wars, lead in revolutions, and underlie every great movement in the scientific, religious, and political world. I need go no further to find an instance than to this great rebellion against the United States.

Two radical ideas—radically false, however—brought on this civil war, which has cost this nation more than half a million lives, and untold millions of treasure.

First, that States had a right to secede; and, Second, that slavery is a blessing.

The surrender of those two ideas by the South is now the basis of permanent peace.

Sir, this question, whether those States are still States in this Union under the Constitution, or not, is no vain abstraction, no idea without immediate, practical, and most grave consequences.

Is it of no practical consequence whether, to adopt an amendment to the Constitution, it requires the ratification of twenty-seven or only of twenty-one States?

Is it of no practical importance whether eleven States, with their ten million people, shall be taxed and governed without representation? With less than one third of that number of people, our forefathers, because the Parliament of Great Britain, in which they had no representation, passed laws to tax them, declared the independence of these States.

Is it of no practical importance whether these eleven States and ten million people shall govern themselves under a republican form of State government, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, or whether they shall be held as subject vassals, to be governed for an indefinite period by the unlimited will of Congress, or by the sword?

Is it of no practical importance whether the flag of our country, for which half a million have laid down their lives, and which bears thirty-six stars as an emblem of a Union of thirty-six States, speaks a nation's truth, or is a monstrous falsehood?

These, and many like questions, are involved in this discussion, and depend upon the answer to the first.

It is, therefore, in my judgment, a question of the first magnitude; a question which must be met; a question which neither men nor parties can avoid or put aside. It demands and will have an answer. It is a question, too, upon which there is and there can be no compromise and no neutrality. They are States in the Union under the Constitution, or they are not. We must affirm the one or the other. We must stand upon one side, supporting the Lincoln and Johnson policy, maintaining the Union of the States under the Constitution to be unbroken, or we must take our stand with the Senator from Massachusetts upon the other, and maintain that the Union is broken; that secession is a success and not a failure, so far at least as to withdraw eleven States from the Union or reduce eleven States to the territorial condition.

First, I call to mind the language of President Lincoln's proclamation of December 8, 1863. In that he said:

"I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion.'"

The policy thus announced was entered upon at once in the States of Louisiana, Tennessee, and Arkansas. It received the unanimous support of every member of his Cabinet. While that great man was always open to conviction, and ready to hear the suggestions of others, he became more and more settled and firm in his convictions as to the wisdom of that policy from the date of that proclamation down to the very day of his death.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that that bill be postponed until to-morrow, in order to allow the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed with his remarks.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Sir, on the 11th of April last he spoke to the people of Washington. It was on the occasion of the illumination, but three days before his assassination. The great army of the rebellion had surrendered. He had himself visited Richmond, where, from the very house occupied by Jefferson Davis, he had, from time to time, telegraphed the gladdening news of victory upon victory to a rejoicing people. He had returned from the chief seat of the rebellion to the capital of the Union, bringing with him, as the spoils of victory, not gold, nor crowns, nor jewels, but the "broken chains of four million slaves." In that hour of triumph, in that moment of supreme exaltation, he could not refrain, when invited, from appearing before the people to add to the general joy. Among other things he said:

"We meet this evening, not in sorrow, but in gladness of heart. The evacuation of Petersburg and Richmond, and the surrender of the principal insurgent army gave hope of a righteous and speedy peace, whose joyous expression cannot be restrained. In the midst of this, however, He from whom all blessings flow must not be forgotten. A call for a national thanksgiving is being prepared, and will be duly promulgated. Nor must those whose harder part gives us the cause of rejoicing be overlooked. Their honors must not be parceled out with others. I myself was near the front, and had the high pleasure of transmitting much of the good news to you; but no part of the honor, for plan or execution, is mine. To General Grant, his skillful officers, and brave men, all belongs."

"In the annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, (as the phrase goes,) which I promised, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the Executive Government of the nation."

"This plan was, in advance, submitted to the then Cabinet, and distinctly approved by every member of it." "Every part and parcel of the plan which has since been employed or touched by the action of Louisiana."

The Senate will remember that Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet then consisted of Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury and now Chief Justice, Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, Mr. Welles, Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Usher, Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Blair, then Postmaster General, and Mr. Bates, then Attorney General. Let us remember each and every one of those men approved every part and parcel of that policy. I read still further from this last great speech, in which he gave, in most forcible language, the reasons which made him adhere to and cherish that policy up to the time of his death:

"Some twelve thousand voters in the heretofore slave State of Louisiana have sworn allegiance to the Union; assumed to be the rightful political power of the State; held elections; organized a free government; adopted a free State constitution, giving the benefit of public schools equally to black and white, and empowering the Legislature to confer the elective franchise upon the colored man. Their Legislature has already voted to ratify the constitutional amendment, recently passed by Congress, abolishing slavery throughout the nation. These twelve thousand persons are thus fully committed to the Union, and to perpetual freedom in the States—committed to the very things, and nearly all the things, the nation wants—and they ask the nation's recognition and its assistance to make good that commitment."

"Now, if we reject and spurn them, we do our utmost to disorganize and disperse them. We, in effect, say to the white man, 'You are worthless, or worse; we will neither help you nor be helped by you.' To the blacks we say, 'This cup of liberty which these, your old masters, hold to your lips, we will dash from you, and leave you to the chances of gathering the spilled and scattered contents, in some vague and undefined when, where, and how.' If this course, discouraging and paralyzing both to white and black, has any tendency to bring Louisiana into proper practical relations with the Union, I have, so far, been unable to perceive it."

"If, on the contrary, we recognize and sustain the new government of Louisiana, the converse of all this is made true. We encourage the hearts and nerve the arms of the twelve thousand to adhere to their work, and argue for it, and proselyte for it, and fight for it, and feed it, and grow it, and ripen it to a complete success. The colored man, too, seeing all united for him, is inspired with vigilance and energy and daring, to the same end. Grant that he desires the elective franchise. Will he not attain it sooner, by saving the already advanced steps toward it than by running backward over them? Concede that the new government of Louisiana is only to what it should be as the egg is to the fowl, we shall sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it." * * *

"I repeat the question, 'Can Louisiana be brought into proper practical relation with the Union sooner by sustaining or by discarding her new State government?' What has been said of Louisiana will apply generally to other States."

Sir, I have given you his own words. I would to God they could be read again and again in the hearing of every American citizen. They come to us as his dying legacy upon the great problem of the hour. They state the important fact that this policy was entered upon by him with the full approbation of every member of his Cabinet as to every part and parcel of that policy.

I repeat, and ask the Senate and the country to hear, we have Mr. Lincoln's positive testimony, that Mr. Seward approved it, in general and in detail; Mr. Chase approved it and every part and parcel of it; Mr. Stanton and Mr. Welles also, who still remain in the Cabinet, fully and cordially approved.

And now, sir, I propose to show you that a higher tribunal than Congress, or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, or the President and his Cabinet, approved and sustained that policy. The loyal people of the United States, represented at Baltimore, approved it by the renomination of Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency. And, as if to make the indorsement of this part of Mr. Lincoln's policy more emphatic, Mr. Johnson was nominated for the Vice Presidency, the very man of all others who had for a long time been engaged in the great work of reconstructing civil government in the State of Tennessee, upon the basis of that policy. It was objected by some in that convention, as it is here, that Tennessee had no right to representation, but, on motion of the distinguished ex-Senator from New York, (Preston King,) now no more, her delegates were admitted. One of her sons, in spite of the objection of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, that he was from a foreign State at war with the United States and therefore an alien enemy, was nominated for Vice President. By those nominations that policy was sustained by the convention.

The election came on. That policy, and the Administration which proclaimed it, and the convention which indorsed it, were sustained by the people of the United States.

Next to the great work of crushing the military power of the rebellion, this policy of reconstruction was dearer to Mr. Lincoln, and more cherished by him, than any other. No sooner had the burden of his soul been lifted, no sooner had he seen the surrender of the great army of the rebellion, than in the fullness and gladness of his soul he made haste to give to the people his views upon the next great theme, reconstruction. I have just read them in your hearing.

The Senator from Massachusetts may denounce them as puerile and wanting in statesmanship. But there they are, and there they will remain forever, the farewell address of Abraham Lincoln to the people of the United States upon this subject of reconstruction.

That Mr. Johnson, upon whom the office of President fell, by the death of Mr. Lincoln, should, substantially, pursue the policy begun by his predecessor, was, therefore, not only natural, but, by the logic of events, almost a necessity. How could he do otherwise? Suddenly, in a moment, as in the twinkling of an eye, the load is thrown from Mr. Lincoln's shoulders upon him; his great responsibility, and his duty, and why not his cherished policy? He was surrounded by the same Cabinet. Who would expect them to advise any other policy?

That policy had been fully entered upon, and in some States the work really done. Mr. Johnson had himself long been engaged in that work, in aiding Mr. Lincoln to realize it in Tennessee. Besides, the convention at Baltimore had sustained it. The great Union party, which re-elected Mr. Lincoln as President, and made Mr. Johnson Vice President, had indorsed it and sustained it triumphantly at the election.

Mr. Johnson could not abandon it without reversing the policy of Mr. Lincoln's administration. That policy was advised by every member of his Cabinet, including, as I have stated, among other names, the very distinguished names of Mr. Seward, Mr. Stanton, and Mr. Welles, still members of the Cabinet, and of Mr. Chase, the Chief Justice, who, just from the bedside of the dying President, administered to Mr. Johnson the oath of his high office. How could he recall that last speech and look upon the dead body of his predecessor; how could he look in the faces of the Chief Justice, as he swore him into office, and of those men in the Cabinet, all of whom had approved every part and parcel of that policy, and upon whom alone he could then rely for counsel and support in the most trying and difficult crisis through which any man was ever called to pass; how, I repeat, could he look upon all those surroundings, and then deliberately abandon the cherished policy of Mr. Lincoln's administration, trample upon the advice of the old members of his Cabinet, as well as of the Chief Justice himself; abandon his well-known convictions of duty; falsify his own record and betray the great Union party which nominated and elected him, in the contingency which had happened, to be the President of the United States? Had he done so, the whole country would have cried out against him, and with reason. In and out of Congress, men might then have denounced him for betraying the public confidence, and especially for betraying the party which elected him. His Cabinet would have remonstrated against it. The last great speech of Mr. Lincoln, like a voice from his grave, "an angel trumpet-tongued," would plead against it. And, more than all, the President would, in my judgment, have been what Mr. Johnson was never known to be, false to his own convictions of duty.

I put aside, therefore, as not worthy of consideration, the suggestions sometimes made that Mr. Johnson, by adhering to this policy of reconstruction, is ready to betray the Union cause or the great measures of the Union party.

Having thus stated the question, and shown the grounds occupied by Mr. Lincoln, and that Mr. Johnson is substantially pursuing his policy, I return to the main question, and will state, as briefly as I can, the grounds upon which I stand, and give my support to what I call the Lincoln-Johnson policy of reconstruction.

Where are those eleven States, and what is their situation?

And first, where are they?

In this Union, under the Constitution, or not? That they once were in this Union all concede. If they have gone out from this Union it must have been by one or more of three ways:

First, by the way of peaceful secession, by voting and resolving themselves out; or,

Second, by successful revolution, by fighting their way out, to a separate independence; or,

Third, they have been put out by act of Congress.

There is not, and never has been, any other way or ways conceived or stated than one or more of these three.

Strong men of the South have maintained that the first way was always open to them. They asserted the right of peaceful secession. It was always met, however. It was overpowered by the logic of Mr. Webster in this body, and resisted by the iron will of Andrew Jackson during his administration.

It has often been reasserted in this body since

I became a member, and as often met and refuted. In their folly and madness, from the decision here, and before the people, the South appealed to arms, to discuss the same question on the field of battle. They tried the second way, namely, by way of revolution, to cut their way out with the sword. That for a time they made fearful progress in that direction no one denies. But did they succeed? No man, North or South, dare affirm it.

No, sir; no.

Thanks to that Almighty Being who rules the universe, the great generals were found at last capable of organizing and wielding our immense forces. Grant and Sherman and Thomas and Sheridan, and the great officers and brave men under their command, crushed the rebellion, wrenched the sword from the hand of revolution, and then, in the last tribunal known to mankind, in an appeal to the God of battles, by the ultima ratio regum, decided, and in such a way as to leave no doubt in any sane mind, North or South, that no State can go out of this Union by the way of peaceable secession, nor by the way of successful revolution. They neither have the right nor the power to do so.

It remains to consider the only other way, the third way, which, for brevity, I will call, with no disrespect to my honorable friend from Massachusetts, THE SUMNER WAY FOR STATES TO GO OUT OF THE UNION, namely, by act of Congress.

At the funeral ceremonies here, upon the death of Judge Collamer, he took occasion to announce his theory of disunion, awarding, in great measure, honor, if honor it be, to the deceased, of separating the rebel States from the Union.

I quote his words:

"The great act of July 13, 1861, which gave to the war for the suppression of the rebellion its first congressional sanction, and invested the President with new powers, was drawn by him. It was he that set in motion the great ban, not yet lifted, by which the rebel States were shut out from the communion of the Union. This is a landmark in our history, and it might properly be known by the name of its author, as 'Collamer's statute.'"

Upon such funeral occasions it belongs to each Senator to judge for himself what he shall say. It is a matter of taste. But one thing seems to me certain; whatever may be said at a funeral, it is no proper time to make a reply, and thus bring on debate. I, therefore, remained silent. I yield to no man in a profound regard for the memory and character of that really great and good man, Judge Collamer, and I intend now to do what my heart prompted me to do then, but which a sense of the proprieties of the occasion compelled me to forego, namely, to defend the statute which he drew, and the Congress which enacted it, the President who approved it, as well as himself, from this charge, that this law has opened a way, or that he, or Congress, or the President intended to open a way by which any State could go out, or be thrust out, from this Union of States under the Constitution.

Sir, Congress, under the Constitution, has power to admit new States into this Union. Congress has no power to expel old States, or to open a way for them to go out; and no man knew better than Judge Collamer that Congress had no such power. He could not have intended to draw such an act without violating his oath to support the Constitution. However lightly some may speak of the obligations of that oath, he was not one of those. He was a radical in the high and noble sense of the term, because he was radically right, radically firm, and radically true to his convictions toward God and toward man.

On one occasion he said:

"I do not know how other members of the Senate look upon the obligation of their oath to support the Constitution of the United States. To me it is an oath registered in heaven as well as upon earth, and there is no necessity that, in my estimation, will justify me in the breach of it. I think those men who are now risking their lives upon the high places of the field to support the Constitution are not to be treated in this Hall by us with the concession that we are ready, if the necessity calls for it, to break it. All that our rebel enemies are engaged in is the overthrow of the Constitution, and all that we are contending for is its maintenance and preservation."

Now, I will not say that the Senator from Massachusetts in the form of seeming praise intended to do any injustice to his name; it was rather to bring, if possible, that great name to the support of his favorite theory. But the effect of what he said would, in my judgment, if accepted, be the greatest possible dishonor; that while Judge Collamer knew that the Constitution gave no right to the States to secede, and gave to Congress no power to expel them or to open a way for them to withdraw from the Union, he, in violation of his oath to support the Constitution, drew this act of July 13, 1861, for the purpose of shutting eleven great States and their ten million people out from this Union under the Constitution. And now, sir, let us look into that statute. It is the fifth section, if any, which clothes the President with this power to expel States from the Union.

How any such power can be found in the language of that section is to me beyond comprehension. The idea which inspired the pen that drew it, so far from being that those States were outside the Union or ought to be placed outside this Union, was directly the opposite, namely, that the people of those States were in the Union, owing allegiance to the Constitution because they were in the Union; that they were struggling to cast off that allegiance by going out from the Union, and that a new war power should be placed by Congress in the hands of the President for the very purpose of forcing them to remain in the Union and resume their allegiance to it, and for no other purpose. That statute was not drawn to shut those States out, but to shut them in the Union; to close every avenue by which supplies could reach them, until the President turning against them the sword, by which they undertook to cut their way out of the Union, should crush all armed resistance and compel the inhabitants to come under the flag and acknowledge once more their allegiance to the Union. What is its language? After certain recitals, it declares:

"Then and in such case it may and shall be lawful for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State or States, or any section or part thereof where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States, and thereupon, all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful, so long as such condition of hostility shall continue."

with a proviso allowing the President in his discretion to license such intercourse as he might think most conducive to the public interest, under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

We notice, first of all, the authority here given is not to declare certain States out of the Union, but to declare their inhabitants in a state of insurrection. Pray, what is an insurrection but an uprising in arms of people against their own Government, an effort to cast off allegiance they owe to it? It is clear, therefore, that if they were not in this Union, they could not make an insurrection against it. Could the people of Nova Scotia or Mexico make an insurrection against the United States? Because they were in this Union is the very ground and the only ground upon which they could be in insurrection at all.

Again, sir, that statute which gave to the President a new war power, by its very terms was to cease with the war necessity. It was a power to stop commercial intercourse, in order to prevent our own citizens from feeding, clothing, and arming the rebellion, which our armies went to put down. When that work was done, the necessity for non-intercourse was gone; and, by the very terms of the act, all power under it was to cease with the cessation of hostility.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend will allow me just this—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With all my courtesy to my honorable friend, I prefer to go on with my remarks without interruption.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to remind the Senator—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With all courtesy to my honorable friend I must decline to give way, because I desire not to have the argument which I am making broken in upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor, and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. SUMNER. I only want to say that my language was, "shut out from the communion of the Union," not, "from the Union;" they could not be shut out from that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But, sir, I do not rest here. That statute was passed on the 13th of July, 1861, just about one week before the battle of Bull Run. We shall never forget that day! Our army, though successful in the morning, became panic-stricken in the afternoon, and came back upon Washington in disorder, utterly demoralized; and members of Congress, too, who went out exulting with "On to Richmond!" upon their lips, to see a great victory, to witness "the races" of fleeing rebels, came fleeing home themselves from the field of disaster.

As soon after that battle as the members of Congress could conveniently assemble, in that hour of deep humiliation to us all, a resolution passed both Houses of Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, declaring our purpose in the prosecution of this war, and especially the determination of Congress in relation to the status and rights of the southern States. In that hour of defeat, when humbled before the nations and before the Supreme Ruler of the world, Congress, almost unanimously in both Houses, declared—

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as those objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This, bear in mind, was after the passage of the Collamer statute, and within two weeks after. It is the later, the more solemn, and the more explicit declaration of the intention of Congress in carrying on the war.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that statute intended to put eleven States out of this Union. Certainly the statute says no such thing. He must infer it. He rests upon inference only, while this resolution, twelve days afterwards, in express terms declares the intention of Congress to keep them in the Union, "to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." By these words, and none can be stronger, Congress in express terms excludes the possibility of that inference. It does more; it rejects his whole theory of disunion. We expelled Bright, of Indiana, for writing a letter to Jefferson Davis, styling him "President of the Confederate States," thus, while a Senator, acknowledging the confederacy, and sympathizing with the secessionists in arms.

Had the Senator from Massachusetts, on the 25th of July, 1861, when we passed that resolution to which I have referred, as to the status of the southern States and the purpose of Congress in prosecuting the war to put down the insurrection, risen in his place here and declared that the Union was dissolved; that Congress, by the Collamer statute, had put eleven of the States out of the Union; that the war was to be prosecuted for the purpose of conquering, holding, and governing those eleven States, and ten million people, for an indefinite period of time, not as States under the Constitution, but as conquered provinces, and without representation; to be governed by the unlimited power of Congress, or by the sword, as Territories, I do not say that any action would have been taken against him personally, for his rights as a Senator would have been his protection; and, more than that, the sincerity of his motives and his unquestioned patriotism would have shielded him; but I do say that if he had then avowed that doctrine, and been made amenable for the guilt of his theory, he would have been expelled from the Senate as a secessionist, at least a disunionist; for certainly such a theory, announced then, would have given aid and comfort to the rebellion at home, and moral power to its friends abroad.

It will be remembered that resolution was offered in the Senate by Mr. Johnson, the present President of the United States, who was then, and for a long time afterward remained, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, and that, too, long after the Collamer statute, according to the Senator's theory, had placed Tennessee outside the Union. What! Tennessee represented in the Union and at the same time outside the Union! Dead and yet alive!

But some may say that resolution passed Congress too soon after the battle of Bull Run to be taken as conclusive upon this question.

I will refer to other acts of Congress if possible still stronger.

The Constitution says:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers."

Under that authority, Congress, after the passage of the Collamer statute, did both—apportioned both direct taxes and Representatives among the several States, including the southern as well as the northern and western States of this Union. I read from the eighth section of the act of August, 1861:

"And be it further enacted, That a direct tax of $20,000,000 be, and is hereby, annually laid upon the United States, and the same shall be, and is hereby, apportioned to the States respectively, and in manner following:

To the State of Maine.....	$428,826 00
To the State of New Hampshire.....	218,462 66½
To the State of Vermont.....	211,068 00
To the State of Massachusetts.....	324,581 33½
To the State of Rhode Island.....	116,963 66½
To the State of Connecticut.....	308,214 00
To the State of New York.....	2,003,918 66½
To the State of New Jersey.....	450,134 00
To the State of Pennsylvania.....	1,946,719 33½
To the State of Delaware.....	74,683 33½
To the State of Maryland.....	436,823 33½
To the State of Virginia.....	937,550 66½
To the State of North Carolina.....	576,194 66½
To the State of South Carolina.....	363,570 66½
To the State of Georgia.....	584,367 33½
To the State of Alabama.....	520,313 33½
To the State of Mississippi.....	413,084 66½
To the State of Louisiana.....	385,886 66½
To the State of Ohio.....	1,567,089 33½
To the State of Kentucky.....	713,695 33½
To the State of Tennessee.....	660,498 00
To the State of Indiana.....	904,875 33½
To the State of Illinois.....	1,146,551 33½
To the State of Missouri.....	761,127 33½
To the State of Kansas.....	71,743 33½
To the State of Arkansas.....	261,886 00
To the State of Michigan.....	501,703 33½
To the State of Florida.....	77,522 66½
To the State of Texas.....	355,106 66½
To the State of Iowa.....	452,088 00
To the State of Wisconsin.....	519,688 66½
To the State of California.....	254,538 66½
To the State of Minnesota.....	108,524 00
To the State of Oregon.....	35,140 66½

Sir, the question I put in the beginning, where are those eleven States? is answered here by Congress; I find them all "included within this Union," to use the language of the Constitution, for the purpose of direct taxation. Every one of those eleven are found there and are taxed by name as States within the Union. Virginia as well as New York; Arkansas by the side of Michigan; Florida and Texas by the side of Iowa and Wisconsin. Direct taxes and representation go together.

Has Congress spoken upon the subject of representation? Most certainly.

By an act approved the 4th of March, 1862, which by its terms was not to take effect till March 4, 1863, Congress apportioned the Representatives upon the basis that those eleven southern States were still States in the Union, with their right to representation unimpaired. By that act, modifying former acts, Congress apportioned Representatives to the several States in this Union as follows:

To Alabama.....	7
To Arkansas.....	2
To California.....	3
To Connecticut.....	4
To Delaware.....	1
To Florida.....	1
To Georgia.....	7
To Illinois.....	13
To Indiana.....	11
To Iowa.....	6
To Kansas.....	1
To Kentucky.....	1
To Louisiana.....	9
To Maine.....	4
To Maryland.....	5
To Massachusetts.....	5
To Michigan.....	10
To Minnesota.....	6
To Mississippi.....	2
To Missouri.....	9
To Nevada.....	1
To New Hampshire.....	1
To New Jersey.....	5
To New York.....	31
To North Carolina.....	8
To Ohio.....	19
To Oregon.....	1
To Pennsylvania.....	24
To Rhode Island.....	2
To South Carolina.....	6
To Tennessee.....	2
To Texas.....	2
To Vermont.....	2
To Virginia.....	8
To West Virginia.....	3
To Wisconsin.....	6

That law is still in force. Under that law the present House of Representatives was chosen; under that law the present House is organized; under that law those eleven States of the South have just as much right to representation as the other twenty-five.

Whether those States are in a condition to choose Representatives, and whether they have chosen right Representatives, are questions I will discuss hereafter. I now speak only of their right to have representation under the existing law of Congress.

Thus, by the action of Congress in apportioning direct taxes and representation—those two fundamentals in republican government—the status of those eleven States as States included within this Union is declared and acted upon.

Once more, by the act of the 7th of June, 1862, amended as late as February, 1863, Congress, in the ninth section, provided that the tax commissioners in insurrectionary districts, after bidding in for the United States lands sold for unpaid taxes, should, in the name of the United States, enter upon and take possession of the same, and lease the same "until the said rebellion and insurrection in said State shall be put down, and the civil authority of the United States established, and until the people of said State shall elect a Legislature and State officers, who shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, to be announced by the proclamation of the President." And the twelfth section provides "that the proceeds of the said leases and sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, one fourth of which shall be paid over to the Governor of said State," "when such insurrection shall be put down, and the people shall elect a Legislature and State officers who shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and such fact shall be proclaimed by the President, for the purpose of reimbursing the loyal citizens of said State, or for such other purpose as said State may direct."

Congress here declares in these sections, not that the States are outside the Union, not that they have lost their rights in the Union, but recognizing the insurrection in these States, declares four things:

1. The intention of Congress to put down the insurrection and reestablish the civil authority in these States.

2. When the insurrection is put down the people of these States have the right to elect their Legislature, Governor, and State officers.

3. When the people elect them, and they take their oath to support the Constitution of the United States, the President is, by law, required to issue his proclamation to that effect. And

4. After the issue of such proclamation, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to pay over certain moneys to the GOVERNOR of the State, to be disposed of as the STATE MAY DIRECT.

That law is in force now; is still the supreme law of the land. Its language demonstrates with complete certainty—a certainty which excludes all doubt—that, in the judgment of Congress, those eleven States are still States in this Union under the Constitution.

Having shown those States to be in the Union under the Constitution, I now inquire, what is their true situation? What rights have they, and what duties devolve on them?

To answer these important questions let us inquire, what constitutes a State?

"A STATE, in the meaning of public law, is a complete or self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights. It has affairs and interests; it deliberates, and becomes a moral person, having understanding and will, and is susceptible of obligations and laws."

All the great writers on public law agree in this.

"In a more limited sense the word State sometimes expresses merely the positive or actual organization of the legislative, executive, or judicial powers; thus the actual Government is designated sometimes by the name of State."

This distinction between what constitutes a State in the meaning of public law, and the word State as sometimes used to designate the form of its government, is just as clear as the distinction between a man and the garment he wears. In the Declaration of Independence this great distinction between the State, the body political, which constitutes the State, and the form of its government, between "the people" whose right it is "to alter or to abolish" their "form of government," and "institute a new government," "organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," is most clearly recognized. The State, the people, the body-politic, "institute, alter, or abolish their form of government." Despotism sometimes treats the body-politic, the State, the people, as if the people were made for the government, and confounds the State with its ruling organization. Not so under the Declaration of Independence, under our republican system. Here the form of government is but an agency to serve the State. Legislatures, judges, and executive officers are servants and not masters. I repeat, under the old despotism the form of government was organized to put all power in the monarch, who sometimes claimed to be the State itself. It was Louis XIV who said, "L'Etat, c'est moi!" I am the State. But the people of France, THE STATE, decapitated this despotic assumption in the person of one of his successors. James I asserted the same absolutism, and the people of England, THE STATE, did the same thing when it brought Charles I to the block. It proved to be a very sad mistake in those crowned heads thus to ignore this distinction between the State and its accidents, between the body-politic itself and a mere form of government, which they, in their absolutism, assumed themselves to be.

This distinction, as it seems to me, is sometimes lost sight of among us, and is the occasion of differences of views on the subject of reconstruction. I may be pardoned, therefore, if I dwell still longer on this important point.

I have shown that in view of public law nothing can be more clear than that a State does not consist of the form of its government. That is one of its accidents. That may be democratic, aristocratic, or theocratic; it may be military; it may be republican, despotic, or monarchial. It may have any one of these forms, or a mixed one, and yet it is a State. It may change its government every year, as a tree casts off its foliage. The State no more consists of its form of government than a man consists of the garment with which he is clothed. He may change that every day, he may be stripped of any garment whatever; but still the man remains: and for a State to change its form, or, for the time being, to be stripped of all form of government, no more destroys its existence than is a man destroyed when he takes off one coat to put on another, or is stripped entirely of his garments.

Nor is a State destroyed by the declaration of martial law in it, nor by war, unless conquered by a foreign Power, or dismembered by revolution, and made into two or more States. To be invaded does not destroy it, if it expel the invader. To be torn by civil war, "and even drenched in fraternal blood," does not destroy it either, unless the final issue of arms shall be against it.

Take the case of Mexico: once a part of the Spanish empire; then a republic; then an empire; again a republic; and then a military dictatorship; once more a republic; in danger now of being usurped by an Austrian monarch, under the protectorate of Napoleon.

But, under all these different forms of government, despotic, republican, military, or imperial, it is the same State. Times without number it has been in civil war, in revolution, almost in anarchy. Its existence as a State, however, still remains; and its rights as a State, among the nations, and especially to choose its own rulers and form of government, remain unimpaired.

Let us now inquire what constitutes a State in this Union, under the Constitution? I answer, the same things which constitute a State not in this Union, except so far as its rights, powers, and sovereignty are limited by the Constitution of the United States. Under that, the United States has entire and absolute sovereignty over all external affairs; over all relations with foreign Powers. The United States has also paramount and absolute sovereignty over all internal affairs committed to it by the Constitution. The State has a limited sovereignty over its domestic affairs and interests. I say limited sovereignty, because an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which three fourths of all the States can adopt at any time, will still further abridge the rights and powers reserved to the States, and thus give additional powers to the United States. Subject to these limitations, however, States in this Union have all the essential attributes, rights, and powers of States not in this Union.

One of the limitations upon those rights is that it shall have no power to organize any State government not republican in form, while it may adopt any form of republican government. And the same distinction between a State and its government is clearly recognized in the clause of the Constitution which provides that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." We see by this language a "State in this Union" is one thing; the form of its government another and different thing. Recognizing the right of a State, under the law of nations, to put on or put off its form of government, it was thought essential to the more perfect union of these States under the Constitution to restrict this power of the State over its form of government so far as to deny its right to put on any other than a republican one. And, therefore, when conspiracy and rebellion attempts it, or when usurpation succeeds in doing so, in any State in this Union, the United States not only has the right, but is bound to intervene against such usurpation, and restore to the State a republican form of State government.

And now, what are the facts? Two radical ideas in the cotton States—radically false, however—namely, that the States had a right to secede, and that slavery was a blessing, had been so long advocated by the statesmen, press, schools, and clergy of those States, that a large portion of their people, both men and women, came to believe in them. These ideas became a part of their political and religious faith. That alone explains the desperate valor and obstinacy displayed by them in this struggle.

Those ideas, like a contagion, pervaded the cotton States, and took deep root in the States of North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, and Kentucky—not to the same extent, however. From conviction, by persuasion, through sympathy, or fear, or force, many of the people—not a majority, however—of the Gulf States followed the lead of their chief conspirators, and were plunged by them headlong into rebellion. Most of the persons exercising the functions of State government, the functionaries from choice, force, or interest, joined it also, and thereby the State governments, as organized, were dominated by the rebellion and made to do its work. It was a usurpation.

In that work they went further, and endeavored to establish a confederation of States, as an independent Power among the nations of the earth. As all these proceedings were in violation of the Constitution, and legally null and void, the United States was bound to treat them as such, and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution.

The rebellion appealed to the sword. Had the rebellion been successful it would have become a revolution, and whether right or wrong, the separation of those States and the overthrow of the Constitution in those States would have become an accomplished fact. But the rebellion was not successful. To attempt and to succeed is one thing; to attempt and fail is another. In the one case it is suppressed insurrection; in the other a successful revolution, in which a new Power is born into the family of nations. Like the bonds for the confederate debt, payable only after the United States shall recognize its independence, the confederacy itself can have no existence until its independence is secured. The whole question turns on success or failure, victory or defeat.

But here arises another and entirely different question: what effect did the rebellion and our overcoming it have upon the functions of the so-called confederacy and of the State governments? The functions of the confederacy, with the confederation itself, were utterly overthrown. It was a complete collapse. Under the Constitution it never had any validity. It was always null and void—an illegality; more, sir, a crime. It rested not upon its right, but upon its sword. When that was taken it vanished. And all that remains to the great conspirators are the disappointed hopes and hideous dreams, unrealized, of madness, folly, and ambition.

But what effect did the rebellion have during its existence upon the forms of government, upon the persons exercising the functions of government, and upon the laws themselves existing before the rebellion in these States? I answer, generally, the rebellion from the beginning was an attempt at revolution, to dissolve the allegiance of those States and their people to the Constitution of the United States, and to transfer that allegiance to the new confederation of States; and for the time being just such changes were made in their form of government and functionaries and laws as would aid that object, and no more.

Bear in mind, the rebellion did not contemplate destroying these States or reducing them into Territories at all. The prominent idea was or pretended to be to save to the States greater rights and powers and sovereignty than were conceded to them in the Union under the Federal Constitution, one of which was this right of State secession.

The whole purpose of the rebellion was to transfer the allegiance of those States from the Federal Union to the confederation of the South. Our whole purpose was to prevent that, and save those States in the Union, and compel them and their people to acknowledge their allegiance to it.

We struggled to save the States in a more perfect Union under our Constitution.

They struggled to save the States with greater rights and powers in the confederation.

Upon this the war was made by them, and upon that issue it went on until the end.

Neither party belligerent sought to destroy, but to save the States.

Neither party sought to destroy, but to save a republican form of government in each of those States.

Neither party sought to take from the people of those States the right to choose their Governors and Legislatures, and to have their own judicial officers, nor to take away the right of representation in a national Government.

But the real issue was whether these officers would bear allegiance to the Federal Union or to the rebel confederacy. Neither party struggled to take from the people of those States their right to govern themselves, under their own State laws—which, after all, is republican government—nor to disturb the great body of those State laws. Except in so far as they aided the Union or the rebel cause, neither sought to make any change, or claimed the right to make any, whatever. It is true that slavery, to defend which was the avowed object of the rebellion, and which became during the war the chief support of its armies, was put directly in issue. It was the corner-stone of their confederacy; and when the confederacy fell its corner-stone was of course buried in its ruins. I can affirm, then, that neither the State nor its government, neither its office of Governor, its Legislature, or its judiciary, were, during the rebellion, sought to be destroyed or changed in any manner by either belligerent party, any further than it bore upon the question of allegiance to the Union upon one side, or to the rebel confederacy upon the other, and to the existence or the destruction of slavery.

But for slavery, and questions growing out of it, and ambitions and ideas fostered by it, there never would have been any rebellion at all.

No change was sought in the status of the States, in the forms of their governments, or in their laws, except for or on account of slavery alone.

Take the case of Georgia, the empire State of the South. Did the rebellion attempt to destroy the State of Georgia, as a State? Not at all. It did attempt to dissolve all relations with the United States, and transfer them to the rebellious confederacy; to throw off allegiance to the Federal Constitution, and come under the confederate constitution; in short, to take Georgia as a State out of the Union and put it into another union, in a new confederation. Had the rebellion succeeded, would the State of Georgia have been destroyed? It would certainly have ceased to be a State in this Union, but it would have still existed as a powerful State, not as a Territory, in its new political relations. The great body of its constitution would remain the same, the great body of its civil and criminal laws the same, as before the rebellion. All the laws on contracts, bargain, sale, and conveyance of real estate; all the laws concerning real or personal estate; the laws of marriage; the family relations; and generally all the rights and remedies affecting persons and property and personal liberty, would have remained the same. No effort was made materially to change them. The only effect, in case the rebellion had succeeded, would have been to make Georgia a State outside of this Union, a State in another Union.

Now that the rebellion has utterly failed to put the State of Georgia into a new union, did the attempt to do so, and the crushing of that attempt, put Georgia as a State out of this Union? or destroy Georgia as a State in this Union? or reduce Georgia from a State in this Union to be a Territory? This seems to be the view advocated by my colleague in his elaborate and able speech upon this resolution. It is due to him and to the important questions involved that I give some further attention to this part of the subject.

I shall not go over the ground I have already trod; I will only observe that it is beyond belief to suppose that the people or the State of Georgia themselves ever intended to reduce themselves from the condition of a State to the condition of a Territory. Their ruling idea, their interest wish, was to exalt the State and make its sovereignty paramount. It was with them a passion. It became their frenzy. The United States had no such purpose either.

I have already shown you that by all the legislation of Congress, by every proclamation of the President, neither Congress nor the President ever held any other language than what was expressed in the last clause of the resolution of July 24, 1861, that our purpose was to maintain the "supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

But to pursue the case of Georgia a little further. While, as I have shown, neither party belligerent sought to destroy, and both sought to save and to hold the State of Georgia, the one as a State in this Union, and the other as a State in the rebel confederation, did the issue of arms, which decided it should not be a State in the confederation, and should remain under the supremacy of the Constitution, reduce Georgia to the territorial condition, against her own wish and the avowed purpose of Congress? I have already shown that Georgia was not changed from a State to a Territory by the rebellion. Was it so changed by our crushing the rebellion?

I admit that, pending the progress of this great civil war, the greatest the world ever saw, the growth of military power was such in all those States of the South as to almost suspend the civil laws—certainly during the last two years of the rebellion; that rebel martial law dominated the whole confederacy, and subjected at will the civil law to its dominion. It became for the time being a bloody rebel military despotism.

When our armies entered Georgia and overcame the rebel army, then what was the effect? The first and immediate effect was to substitute Union martial rule for rebel martial rule. Neither the one nor the other, as we have seen, destroyed the existence of the State. But it did what war always does, more or less, suspended for the time being the civil laws and the functions of civil government in the clash of arms. It neither suspended nor destroyed the State, but it changed the ruling power in it from the commander of the rebel army to the commander of the Union army.

Just before General Sherman entered Georgia, what was the law of Georgia? The will of the rebel general. Just after his surrender, what became the law of Georgia then? The will of General Sherman, under the Commander-in-Chief, both under the Constitution of the United States. The whole people of Georgia, black and white, bond and free, became subject, for the time being, to military rule, subject to military control, under the laws of war. Of all governments the military is most despotic. It is concentrated despotism, despotism without any mixture. He could have wasted every field, burned every dwelling, sacked every town, pressed every man into service. He did capture and set free every slave. I may here say those slaves are our prisoners, captives which we have taken from their masters; and by the agencies of the Freedmen's Bureau, under the War Department, we are now endeavoring to make them free in fact, as well as in right.

There was not a horse or mule he could not have taken; not a man, woman, or child he could not have sent out of the State or employed in any service he might have deemed necessary or useful to put down the rebellion, to put an end to the war, which the law of nations does not forbid.

But did General Sherman destroy or intend to destroy the State of Georgia? Did the President order him to destroy it? By no means. He went to save, not to destroy. Did Congress direct the President to destroy it? No; but it did direct him, in the most solemn form, to prosecute the war to preserve Georgia as a State in the Union, with all its "dignity, equality, and rights unimpaired," and that when that object was accomplished the war ought to cease. To that end Congress clothed the President with greater military power than any nation has developed in modern times. And all this tremendous power of the President is conferred by law of Congress. Nothing, in my judgment, can be more certain than that Congress has by law expressly delegated to the President the power to do all he has done in those States, or it has imposed upon him duties which necessarily involved or implied all the powers he has exercised.

By the act of July 22, 1861, the President was authorized to accept five hundred thousand volunteers for the purpose of suppressing insurrection, "provided that the services of the volunteers shall be for such time as the President may direct, not exceeding three years; nor less than six months, and they shall be disbanded at the end of the war." Disbanded by whom? By the President. When disbanded? At the end of the war.

Congress by this and other acts authorizes the President to put into the field nearly two million soldiers to put down this rebellion; to use every means on sea and on land known to civilized warfare to put an end to the war; Congress expressly directs him to disband the volunteers at the end of the war, and by act of July 29, 1861, to reduce the standing Army to twenty-five thousand within one year after the end of the "existing insurrection and rebellion."

But what shall constitute the end of the war? Congress, by resolution of July 24, unanimously declared the end to be when the supremacy of the Constitution is reestablished, and the Union is preserved with the rights, equality, and dignity of every State unimpaired. Congress also declares that the reduction of the standing Army shall take place within "one year after the constitutional authority of the Government of the United States shall be reestablished, and organized resistance to such authority shall no longer exist"—that is, one year after the end of the war. It is not, as the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague seem to suppose, to end when those eleven States shall be reduced from their position of States in the Union with their "dignity, equality, and rights unimpaired," to the condition of Territories, which are mere dependencies, with no dignity, no equality, no rights under the Constitution, except to be governed by the absolute will of a Congress in which they have no representation, or to be held by the despotism of the sword. The end of the war was to be the suppression of the rebellion and the maintenance of the Union, under the Constitution, unbroken.

But who is to judge when the constitutional authority of the Government is reestablished? Who is to judge when the organized resistance to such authority has ceased? Upon whom rests the responsibility of deciding these questions? Congress expressly says the volunteers shall be employed as long as the "President shall direct; that he shall disband them at the end of the war; and reduce the regular Army one year after constitutional authority shall be reestablished and organized resistance no longer exist."

The President alone is made the judge of the time when the insurrection is suppressed and when the Army shall be withdrawn. It is no power and no responsibility assumed by him in derogation of law. It is expressly imposed upon him by Congress as a duty. Congress by law authorized and required the President,

First, to raise the Army.

Second, to suppress the insurrection, and reestablish the supremacy of the Constitution.

Third, to preserve the Union of the States with their rights in the Union unimpaired.

Fourth, to judge and determine when those ends are attained.

Fifth, after those ends shall be attained, to disband the Army, and return the soldiers once more to the pursuits of peace.

In short, Congress not only empowered, but required, the President to perform a twofold duty: one, to make war; and the other, to stop making war after its end is reached; in other words, to make peace; the first, to draw and wield the sword; the second, after making peace, to return it to its scabbard.

The first of these great duties, namely, drawing the sword and wielding it, rested mainly upon President Lincoln. The second, namely, making peace, and then sheathing the sword, rests mainly upon his successor; although most fortunately, for him, and for the whole people, Mr. Lincoln had already entered upon the great work of reconstruction, of making peace, in order to be able, after peace had come—to borrow his own beautiful language, after “peace had come, and come to stay,” to fulfill that other great duty imposed upon him by the laws of Congress; namely, to disband his immense Army and send them home; in a word, to restore a nation's peace, in a union of States and people under the Constitution, with “their rights unimpaired,” and, after that great work, the end and object of all our struggles and sacrifices, was done, to sheathe the nation's sword. While he lived, Mr. Lincoln performed these duties, and performed them well. It is true, there were some mistakes in the beginning; with our inexperience and impatience the wonder is there were not more. Time was necessary to accomplish the great work, to educate the public mind, to prepare the armies, and to find the leaders who were capable of commanding them.

How could Mr. Lincoln know, unless gifted with omniscience, that in the person of a teacher of a military academy in Louisiana, was to be found that Major General Sherman, who, like God's flaming minister, at the head of his conquering legions, was to sweep through the heart of the rebellion? How could he know that in that quiet, unostentatious citizen of Galena, was to be found the great captain of the age, Lieutenant General Grant, who knew when, “like Fabius, to be the cloud, and like Scipio, the thunderbolt of war?” Thank Heaven! he found the great commanders at last, which in God's own good time brought the final and supreme victory over the rebellion. Thank God! Mr. Lincoln was permitted to live until the first great work of crushing the rebellion was almost done, and the second hardly less important work of reconstruction was already well begun. I have already called your attention to his last public speech just before his assassination, in which, in gladness of heart whose expression could not be restrained, for the hope of a righteous and speedy peace, and in which, also, with a power of logic and clearness of statement, and force of illustration never surpassed in the best efforts of that great and good man, he explained and defended and enforced this policy of reconstruction.

It was at such a moment—a moment of most supreme exaltation—when the prayer of his soul was answered; when the long night of blood and agony and tears was past, and the golden light of the morning of peace dawned upon his vision, he fell by the assassin's hand—his consciousness suspended in an instant. From the acme of human glory he passed to the glory on high—from this mortal to the immortal life—a martyr to the cause of his country, and of liberty to all mankind. It was what the ancient world would call an apotheosis.

Thus the great office of President providentially fell upon Mr. Johnson, with all its duties and all its responsibilities; and the gravest of them all, now that the armed forces of the rebellion have surrendered, is this second great duty of making peace, and then disbanding the Army. When he took the Presidency there were more than a million men upon the rolls of the Army, and many of the rebel armies were still in the field.

I now come to the consideration of the most important, and just at this moment perhaps the most practical, question, namely: what were the powers and duties imposed by law upon the President, in closing the war and making peace, which, of necessity, must precede the disbanding of the Army?

Now, in the very nature of things, making peace is just as much an executive duty as waging war.

Who can know, but the Commander-in-Chief, when his adversary yields, when he is destroyed or captured, surrenders, or makes overtures of peace? To whom does the vanquished party cry for quarter and terms of surrender, but to him who wields the sword?

I repeat, sir, making peace is an executive duty just as much as making war. The law of Congress which authorized the war authorized the stopping of the war; the disbanding of the forces which are employed in it, when the President has finished his work and shall think it safe and proper to do so; when he is assured that the war is over, that peace has come, “and come to stay.”

If we are engaged in war with a foreign country, when we get through with the war, the President makes peace. Congress has nothing to do with it. The President enters into a treaty of peace, and that treaty is submitted to the Senate for ratification. If two thirds of the Senate advise and consent, the treaty is ratified and peace is made. Congress may declare war, they do not make peace.

How is peace made in case of a civil war among ourselves? When we overcome armed resistance to our laws and the Constitution, which is civil war, when the insurgents shall, in good faith, submit themselves to the laws and the Constitution, peace follows of course. Peace has already come, for obedience to the laws is peace.

All the great writers on public law agree that the whole end and purpose of a just war is to obtain a just and righteous peace; and having shown that this duty of making peace has been placed by Congress upon the President; having shown that, from the necessities of the case, such a duty is executive, and therefore, in its nature, impossible to be done by Congress except through the Executive, I proceed to inquire with whom, and in what way, is the President to make that peace which was the object of the war on our part, and which was a condition precedent to withdrawing the Army? That involves this other inquiry, who and what was or is at war against the United States?

First of all, the rebel army.

No one can doubt the power of the President to deal with that—to fight it, crush it, capture it, or accept its surrender, with or without conditions. If upon conditions, these conditions bind the good faith not only of the Executive but of the United States.

In the terms of Lee's capitulation there was an important condition inserted, binding the good faith of the United States, namely, that, upon condition of their obedience to the laws, the officers and soldiers of the rebel armies should not be disturbed by the authorities of the United States. What member of Congress, what man, in or out of Congress, would propose a violation, on our part, of that stipulation?

There is, in the second place, the people of those States, who have been declared in insurrection, who, from giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, have incurred the crime of treason against the United States, and who are liable, upon trial and conviction, to forfeit their property, their citizenship, and even their lives.

What power has the President, under the Constitution and laws, to deal with these unarmed insurgents? First, under the Constitution, he has the power to pardon and restore to citizenship, either before or after conviction; he has the power of amnesty, upon such terms and conditions as he shall judge most conducive to the peace of the country.

If, as many contend, the insurgents are to be treated only in their capacity of individuals, and not in their capacity as States, this power of pardon alone would cover the whole case, and he could restore all to citizenship.

But he had another power over them under the laws of Congress; and I now inquire, upon the surrender of the armies, what further power had the President to deal with those persons who, though not found in arms, were still equally guilty by aiding and abetting the rebellion? I answer, all the power of Commander-in-Chief exercising military rule in those States for the time being.

By the law of nations, the commander of a great and conquering army when he enters a State, for the time being subjects all the civil laws to military control; his will becomes the supreme law, and he a temporary dictator. He may organize a provisional civil government, as the Supreme Court decided in the case of Cross against Harrison, to preserve order and prevent anarchy. Beyond all question, before withdrawing or disbanding his Army, he had the power, and it was his imperative duty, to know whether the rebels not found in arms, who, as many insist, were a large majority of the people of those States, had also submitted and surrendered the rebel cause. Had he at once withdrawn the Union Army upon the surrender of the rebel army, who knows but that another rebel army would have been raised at once to fight against the Government? It was as much his duty, therefore, under the laws of Congress, for him to make sure of their submission before withdrawing the troops as it was to make sure of the surrender of their armies. Without their submission his work would have been only half done. He therefore had a right—ay, sir, it was his imperative duty—to deal directly with the unarmed rebels as well as with their military forces, which he could do both as military commander, and as holding the power to pardon.

But there are some who maintain that the States, as bodies politic, in their State capacity waged this war upon the Government. Without admitting or denying this assumption, grant, for the sake of the argument, that to be so, what power and duty would, in that view of the case, be imposed upon the President by law of Congress? I answer, to deal with the States as belligerents.

If the States, as such, were in rebellion and waging war against the United States, then, of course, the law authorizing the President to prosecute the war against the rebellion of necessity authorized the President to prosecute the war against the States; and, as he was not authorized to disband the Army until the war was over, and as the war could not be over until the States submitted to the conditions of peace, the President had the power and it became his duty to deal directly with the States upon the terms and conditions of peace. It was just as much a necessity for him to know that the States submitted and accepted the terms of peace, as that their armies should surrender, before he disbanded the Army of the United States. The object of all legitimate war is to conquer a peace.

If the States, as such, were at war against the United States, the capture of an army would not end the war so long as they should remain hostile. The Army was to be reduced when “organized resistance” should no longer exist. So long as organized States are at war against the Government organized resistance does exist, and he could not disband the Army. Had he immediately upon the surrender of the armed forces disbanded our Army, leaving the States still at war, there would be no peace, and could be no peace; and peace was to be a condition precedent to his disbandment of the Army. All the writers on the law of nations concur that the only lawful purpose of war is peace. The President, therefore, being authorized by law to make peace, was empowered to deal with all the parties at war against the United States, namely, with the rebel army; with all the rebel insurgents, whether they are to be regarded as acting in their individual capacity, or in their organized political capacity as the people of a State.

I now inquire, what must be the terms and conditions of peace in order to put an end to civil war in these United States? I answer, the Constitution of the United States is the paramount and indissoluble bond of union and relationship and peace among the several States. An attempt to overthrow that is civil war. Submission to that is peace. Therefore, neither the President, nor Congress, nor the Supreme Court, nor all put together, can make any other treaty of peace or bond of relationship among the States. Nothing short of successful revolution, or of a decision of the sovereign people of the United States to amend that Constitution, can change the relationship between the States one jot or tittle. Though men and parties may change, the Constitution as the basis of that relationship in this Union will remain perpetual.

What terms had the President a right to demand of these States, or of their people, as conditions precedent to peace and the withdrawal of the Army?

First, and before all, and as the basis of all, unqualified submission to the Constitution of the United States, and all laws of Congress passed in pursuance thereof.

Second, the annulling of all acts, laws, and proceedings by which the States made or prosecuted war against the United States, including the rebel debt.

Third, acquiescence in the situation which the war has brought upon them, including the abolition of slavery, for and on account of which they made the war; for the sincerity of such acquiescence, and as the supreme test of its good faith, the adoption of the constitutional amendment by which slavery, the cause of the war, is surrendered and made impossible, and liberty made sure, by being placed under the guardianship of Congress in every State and Territory forever.

Fourth, the practical resumption of their political duties, upon those terms, as States in the Union.

These are the conditions, in substance, upon which President Lincoln almost three years ago announced to the people of these States the terms of pacification to which he pledged the support of the Executive Government.

These are the substance of the terms offered by President Johnson.

Several of the States, or the people of several States, have accepted them, and offer now to resume all their political duties as States in this Union, and practically enjoy their rights as such. Shall we allow them to do so?

If these terms have been accepted by these States, or the people of these States, in good faith, is not the faith of this nation pledged? Just as much pledged as by the terms contained in the surrender of their armies?

It is not a sufficient answer to say, this Congress is not bound by the acts of preceding Congresses, and therefore we can pass laws requiring the President to impose other and new terms of pacification not required by preceding Congresses. Technically that may be urged; but it will not do for a great nation, dealing with a fallen enemy after he has surrendered, to impose new and other terms. Had we been fighting with any foreign Power, the treaty made by the President would have been most scrupulously kept. As between and among the States, the Constitution—which is the treaty of peace, and more than a treaty, which forms a perfect Union, and makes the States one family—is certainly to be regarded with equal sacredness and validity on our part, when after a civil war peace is made, and the offending citizen or State makes submission in good faith, and seeks to renew allegiance. Nothing is more clear than that we have made no conquest of these States. We hold them only by virtue of our original right as States under the Constitution.

But the question is sometimes put, by what power then, if these States are still in the Union, does the President appoint these provisional or military governors? That question is important; but to that question the answer, in my judgment, is perfectly clear. The President does not make the appointment of these agents, call them by what name you will, provisional governors, military governors, commissioners, agents, heralds of peace, generals, anything you please, nor does he employ these agencies, by virtue of his authority as a civil magistrate. They are not civil appointments. They are in no sense civil officers, for there is no law under which they are appointed at all. They are more military agents of the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, who is bound to ascertain the fact, which he must know before he can discharge this duty of mustering the forces out and of withdrawing the Army. He sends these agents into the several States for the purpose of ascertaining whether the rebellion is suppressed; not only whether the people have ceased armed resistance, but intend to submit in good faith and make no more resistance to the authority of the Government. These agents are by him authorized to ascertain that fact; in substance, to put certain questions to the people in these States, no matter in what form they are to be answered, whether by an election, the casting of ballots, or by an oath. The question is, "Are you willing now, in good faith, to submit to and accept the true situation which the war has brought upon you? Are you ready, as free States, to put on a republican form of government? And are you determined hereafter to be lawful and law-abiding citizens of the United States?" If they answer that they are, what then? "Assure me of that," says the President, "and I will withdraw the military power; I will no longer hold you as Commander-in-Chief; I will no longer govern you by martial law; I will withdraw the troops and let the civil laws, which are silent in the midst of arms, once more come into full play. You may substitute the ballot of the loyal citizen for the bayonet of the soldier which I command. I can then safely sheathe the sword and leave you to yourselves. And when I can do that there is peace."

This is the substance of it all. You may say there is an air of the civilian, a scent of the civil law and civil authority in the legal forms employed in which to put and answer these questions. What of that? These agents are military agents, although wearing the garb of the civilian. They are called provisional governors, but in reality they are commissioners to propose terms of peace or to see if peace has come in reality, or whether it is a hollow and deceitful appearance of peace only. They are not civil governors, but provisional governors. No matter what you call them; names are of no consequence. If they had been sent out simply as spies, by a commanding general to ascertain the temper of the people; to learn whether they mean to keep the peace, or, soon as the Army is withdrawn, to fight again, for the purpose of satisfying the President whether he could safely withdraw his military force or not, it is all the same thing. It is, of necessity, a military question, and clearly within the scope and duty of a military commander. It is, therefore, no invasion, no trampling upon the rights of any of those States, to use such agencies.

Now, to illustrate this a little more fully. Suppose the President had not employed anybody, but had gone himself to do all these things that his agent, his commissioner, provisional governor, or whatever you call him, is authorized by him to do; and suppose he should go around himself among the people, and that all his Cabinet should go along with him, administering oaths of allegiance, and organizing elections by which the people could show their disposition toward the Government, in order that, upon his own knowledge, he could determine whether it was his duty still to keep the Army in force or to withdraw it, and say to the people of the State, "Now you can go on; I leave you to yourself; reorganize your civil government, republican in form;" what then would become of this objection that the President was assuming power? It would vanish in an instant.

But suppose he had done this, which in my judgment would have been the simplest of all; suppose he had authorized the general in command to act for him, to do all this through officers in the Army, to test the loyalty and allegiance of the people of that State toward the Government of the United States; to advise them to accept the situation in which the war has placed them; to abolish the institution of slavery; to ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which abolishes slavery in every State, and thus demonstrate that they have accepted their situation as free States forever as the result of this war? Or, go a step further, and suppose that he had authorized General Sherman to make just these propositions to them; suppose they had been made as a part of the term of the surrender of the armies under the express direction of the President, who could ever doubt the President's power as Commander-in-Chief to make them? Who, then, I ask, can doubt that the President has power to send an agent down into any one of those States, and by the co-operation of the military commander, do precisely the same thing now? Who can doubt it?

The reason, probably, why the Administration, instead of employing a general in command, appointed special agents to do this duty, was twofold: first, because it was supposed that some person who had personal influence among the people, who had not been connected with the Army, might have more influence in prevailing upon that people to accept the situation war had brought upon them than one who had passed through their country in the terrible storm of war, and whose red right hand had been to them like the scourge of God. It was doubtless supposed that a man selected from among their own people, of great influence among them, might be listened to, that his counsels would be more likely to lead them in their very souls to submit, in good faith, to the authority of the Government. We know that, in ancient times, there were certain persons performing substantially the same duties, who were denominated heralds, who were sent out to announce terms of peace upon the termination of the conflict. It does not matter by what names these persons are called. The power exists as one of the necessary incidents of military authority and military operations, a part of which is to make peace as well as to make war.

Another reason, probably, why Mr. Johnson appointed these provisional governors grows out of the fact that his predecessor made similar appointments, and substantially adopted the same policy. As Mr. Johnson's Cabinet is composed of the same men who constituted the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln, no doubt their advice has been to him the same which they gave to Mr. Lincoln, and which he has accepted as the true policy in restoring civil government in those States.

You remember, as I have before stated, that Mr. Johnson himself was appointed military governor of Tennessee. He had experience in that capacity in endeavoring to restore civil government in that State. Probably no man in the United States was better prepared to judge than Andrew Johnson, growing out of the fact of his ability, his perfect knowledge of the South and of the people of the South, and his actual experience while he was military governor, as he was called, of Tennessee. Therefore he was likely to follow Mr. Lincoln in the line of policy adopted by him, and which he had himself actually tried and put into operation.

But I now come to the question of representation in Congress.

Having shown them to be States in this Union, and therefore entitled to representation under the Constitution; having shown that Congress, by the same law under which the present House was elected and organized, apportioned the two hundred and forty-one members just as much among these eleven southern States as among the remaining twenty-five, and that under that law their right to representation is just as certain as the right of any northern State. I now come to consider another and wholly different question.

First, whether they have properly chosen Senators and Representatives; and Second, whether they have chosen right Representatives.

Although a State may have a right to choose Representatives, it may not be in a condition to choose them. A raging pestilence might suspend elections; a foreign invasion might make them impossible; insurrection and civil war might do the same thing; the temper of a people might become so diseased or estranged, that for a time they would refuse to choose them. While this would not take away the right to have Representatives it would deprive them of Representatives in fact.

Again, in exercising the right to choose, they may select men, incapable, ineligible, or unfit to be received in either House of Congress.

A friend asked me the other day, shall this Congress admit as Senators and Representatives rebels fresh from the battle-field, whose swords are yet dripping with the blood of our sons and brothers? No, sir, no; who has ever thought or dreamed of any such thing? The oath required of them makes that impossible. And does any one suppose that this Senate, which expelled Bright for writing a letter to Jefferson Davis, has not the power or the courage to defend itself against the guilty instigators of this great crime? Have we no confidence in ourselves?

Another asked, what security have we that the South will not rebel again if we admit their representatives? I answer this question by another: would there not be tenfold more danger of their rebelling if we do not give them representation than if we do? Who does not know that the most justifiable of all causes for rebellion or revolution is to tax and govern a people without representation? The old Thirteen rebelled against England for that, and four of those thirteen are among the States my colleague would now reduce to the territorial condition. Up to this time the South never had any justifiable cause for rebellion.

Follow out the policy of the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague, and you will give them what all the world will say is a just cause for war. By so doing, we shall change positions with them. We shall place ourselves in the wrong, and give them just cause of complaint, now that they have surrendered. We were right in the beginning; right in every step of our progress in the war; right in authorizing the President to end the war when the supremacy of the Constitution was vindicated, and the union of the States, with their rights and equality unimpaired, restored; right in tendering to the rebels upon their surrender magnanimous terms of peace, more magnanimous than we would offer to a foreign foe, because they are a part of our people, with whom by interest, by necessity, and by the logic of geographical and commercial position, we are forever bound to live and hold the closest relations. If we now direct the President to withdraw the terms of pacification he has offered and they have accepted, and above all, if we should in the spirit of this resolution of my colleague, declare them no longer States in this Union, but Territories, subject to the control of Congress as the other Territories of the United States, we should place ourselves in the wrong, falsify all our professions of devotion to the integrity of the Union, and reduce them to be our dependents and vassals.

For one moment consider the condition of the Territories. They are not under the Constitution at all. Mr. Webster in one of his masterly efforts, Mr. Benton in his review of Dred Scott, demonstrated that the Constitution is for States and not for Territories at all. Territories are outside dependencies, and governed by Congress, not under its power limited by the Constitution, but by its absolute power. The Supreme Court decided in Canter's case, and have often affirmed the doctrine, that Congress possessed all legislative power over the Territories as absolute as in the District of Columbia.

What, in effect, does the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague propose? To place outside of the Constitution and to govern with unlimited power eleven States and ten million people, nearly one third of all the States and people of the United States, without any representation. And is this the way to pacify a great country and satisfy the wish of a great people?

The people of the South have been so completely prostrated by this war that they would bear almost any humiliation before rising in arms again. But if there is any mode of proceeding more likely than any other to provoke them to do so it is this proposition thus to reduce them to be our vassals.

What effect would it have upon ourselves?

It would turn the North into a nation of slaveholders, the people of the South being our slaves. All slavery in the end destroys both master and slave. This would very soon make the South not fit to be free, and we ourselves become too much corrupted and demoralized by the exercise of such power to permit them to be free.

To hold them thus would require the presence of a large standing army, which, if kept on foot for a long time, is sure in the end to undermine the virtue of republican institutions and prepare the way for a concentrated despotism, perhaps an empire.

It would subject us to incalculable expense, which the financial situation of the country is in no condition to bear.

It would, in my opinion, and in this I feel that I am sustained by the opinion of the present able head of the Treasury, affect our national credit most disastrously at home and abroad. It is well known that upon the reception of the President's message at Frankfort-on-the-Main our bonds advanced two per cent. Reverse his policy and treat those States as subject, conquered provinces, and our national credit would sink at once. Such a course would incite, if not produce, another civil war.

It would keep the question open, to be the source of ever-increasing irritation, until all hope of union would be gone.

It would demoralize and dishearten the friends of the Union at the South, and turn their loyalty into hatred. "If," said Mr. Lincoln, "we reject and spurn them, we do our utmost to disorganize and disperse them. If, on the contrary, we recognize and sustain them, the converse of all this is made true; we encourage their hearts and nerve their arms to adhere to their work, and argue for it, and proselyte for it, and fight for it, and feed it, and grow it, and ripen it into a complete success." It would make those who hated the Union during the war, and who, upon the surrender of Lee, gave up all hope or thought of further resistance, and were ready to renew their allegiance to the Constitution, hate the Union more bitterly than ever.

Again, sir, other grave considerations plead to sustain the President's policy. How can we hope that the great mass of the people South will engage earnestly and hopefully in the production of cotton, the great staple of export, unless the pacification of the States is made complete, and in time for the coming crop?

Our financial situation, therefore, demands peace, and peace as a reality. Such a peace would be impossible if we attempt to reduce those States to the condition of Territories.

Some speak of the wealth of our mines. I do not doubt it. But for present resources to meet our engagements they cannot compare with the cotton fields of the South. Every dollar of gold produced in Colorado has thus far cost two. When the railroad reaches the mountains, to carry laborers and supplies, that will be reversed; but not till then.

But were peace now fully restored the cotton fields of the South, worked by free labor and free capital, this season would produce all that our necessities require, and all that industry should hope for to those who engage in it.

I have just seen a letter from William A. Parker, from Evergreen, Alabama, under the date of January 8, 1866, to the Commissioner of Agriculture, in which he says:

"As it may not be uninteresting to you to know what are the agricultural prospects of the present year in this section, I will briefly state the results of my observations in this and the adjoining county of Monroe.

"There is a vigorous and enterprising spirit prevalent. The preparations for the coming crop in the two respects of land and labor are more extensive than ever before.

"The freedmen have shown themselves willing and ready to enter into fair and reasonable contracts to perform labor. Nearly all of them are already employed.

"Planters and farmers are sanguine. A better state of things generally exists than has been known for a long time in this part of the country. There is less idleness and more work on the part of all classes. There is also being exhibited an increased interest in education.

"I have the honor to be, &c."

Sir, everything in our power shall be done to secure the crop of the coming season.

Again, sir, how do we stand in relation to foreign Powers? Who does not know that during the rebellion the Emperor of France desired and believed in its success? Because he believed in it he undertook the Mexican intervention. Lord Palmerston sympathized with him, and would, if he could, have committed England to join with him to establish the independence of the southern confederacy.

But England saw a few piratical cruizers, built in her ports and manned by her sailors, under the rebel flag sweeping our commerce from the ocean. She saw at once, that in case of war with us, our cruizers would swarm in every sea and destroy her commerce in return. Therefore, from interest, she refused to accept Napoleon's offer.

And now, can any man so far blind himself to the situation as not to know that we must close up this civil war and restore the union of these States in such a manner as to have the right to claim the allegiance of the southern people before we can speak with the voice of a united people, either to England about damages or to France about intervention in Mexico?

There is no great consideration worthy of a statesman in this crisis which does not plead for and insist upon pacification, and, in my judgment, there is no better way than to carry out the Lincoln-Johnson policy of reconstruction.

The war of blood is over. It is now a moral warfare; a warfare with the reasons, hearts, feelings, passions, prejudices, and sentiments of that people. And of all the propositions which can be conceived there is none, in my judgment, which will so shock the reason, so deeply wound the sensibilities, and so rouse the passions and prejudices of that people, as this proposition to tax and govern them without representation. I now speak of the great mass of the people in those States.

Let no man misunderstand my position. With those guilty leaders who, in this Senate and elsewhere, incited the people of those States to revolt, I have and can have no sympathy. They deserve none. Since the angels rebelled in heaven there has been, in my judgment, no such crime against God or man.

Why should I have sympathy for them? Do I not remember that if all the blood they have caused to be shed had been poured out in one vast reservoir, Jefferson Davis, his cabinet, and the whole rebel congress could have swam in it? Do I not remember that our prisoners at Andersonville and at other places have been starved to death by thousands, and that upon the authors of such barbarities no punishment is too great? Ah! can I ever forget, until this heart shall cease to beat, that my eldest son, the pride of my life, has been sacrificed in this war, caused by these guilty conspirators? However strong my indignation toward the guilty leaders, I will not allow myself to forget that the great mass of the people of the South were honestly misled by the teachings of Calhoun and his disciples, the press, the schools, and the clergy, upon the right of secession and the blessings of slavery. Nor will I blind my eyes to the fact, equally true, that now the mass of the thinking men of the South, and especially those who were in the rebel army, have not only surrendered their arms, but have surrendered those two ideas upon which alone they made the war. Upon this subject the concurrent testimony of Generals Grant and Sherman, and all the great officers of the Army, is conclusive. They have morally surrendered their cause.

Toward the mass of the people, then, I do have sympathy. In my judgment it is our duty and our best policy to carry out in good faith the terms of pacification tendered by President Lincoln and President Johnson, and accepted by them. Let us at once recognize them as States in the Union, entitled to representation, and take up for consideration each State by itself, and inquire into the election returns and qualifications of those who claim the right to represent them. Let us begin with the State of Tennessee.

My colleague assumes to say that he speaks the voice of loyal Wisconsin. Sir, I do not doubt his sincerity. But I venture to say that, in my opinion, he will find himself greatly mistaken. I know that the late convention of the Union party in that State unanimously resolved that the States of the South were still States of this Union, and that neither by peaceful secession nor by force of arms could they be taken out of this Union under the Constitution.

Another resolution adopted by that convention reads as follows:

"That the animus which caused the late rebellion against the United States, was born of the pride and ambition of an aristocracy founded upon slavery, which the war and the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln has rightfully destroyed; but we deem it essential to the regeneration of the late slave, but now free States, that they should, in good faith, accept their new situation as free States, not only by abolishing slavery in their State constitutions, but by the ratification by their Legislatures of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, submitted by Congress and now pending, which forever abolishes slavery in every State, and empowers Congress to pass all laws necessary to secure liberty to all the people, black and white. By its adoption the cause of the rebellion will be removed, slavery destroyed, and liberty established upon a foundation which neither State, nor President, nor Congress, nor court, nor change of parties, can shake—as enduring as the globe itself. By its adoption by the people of those States all the world will know that they accept freedom as their situation, and give up slavery and all hope of restoring slavery forever.

That through the influence of certain newspapers and speeches, there may be some division of sentiment among the members of the Union party now is possible. But when my colleague goes before the people of Wisconsin with the proposition to reduce eleven States to the territorial condition; to tax and govern eleven States and ten million people without representation; when he proposes in effect to do what the rebellion could not do, tear the national flag in twain; to take eleven stars from that flag and reduce the number to twenty-five, he will find, in my humble opinion, that he has utterly mistaken the people of Wisconsin.

If he had said that they look upon treason as a crime, and that some of the guilty leaders should be tried and convicted; if he had said that they insist that under the constitutional amendment Congress should see that the freedman is protected in his civil rights of life, liberty, and property; if he had said that since the abolition of slavery in the southern States has disturbed the basis of apportionment in the House of Representatives, a more just apportionment might be made having reference to the voting or taxable population of the several States, I would agree with him. But upon this proposition of his he would find himself in a minority of less than one third of the voters of Wisconsin. The loyal people of Wisconsin, and of all the States, have been fighting for the integrity of the Union and the entirety of the flag; for pacification upon the basis of the union of the States under the Constitution. If this Congress will not act upon that basis, the next Congress will. That is the corner-stone. Whosoever shall fall upon that stone will be broken in pieces; but upon whomsoever it shall fall it will grind him to powder. Men and cliques and parties may oppose and for a time postpone. But as sure as to-morrow's sun shall rise, it will come. Whosoever stands in its way will be trampled in pieces.

In conclusion, from the beginning, and from before the beginning, any separation or destruction of the States, was made impossible. Under the old Confederation, the Union of the States was made "perpetual." And the Constitution was formed to make a more "perfect Union." To admit, therefore, either the right of States to secede, or the power of Congress to expel them, would be to admit into our system a principle of self-destruction wholly at war with a perpetual or perfect Union. The Constitution, every part of it, and the spirit which gives it life, are against peaceable secession; and that Constitution clothes the Government which it creates with every human power to prevent a separation by force of arms. Those gigantic powers, which had slumbered so long that they were wholly unknown to the world, and hardly dreamed of by ourselves, have been lately brought into full play.

Whatever may be said of the crime of the rebellion, history will record it as one of the most persistent, self-sacrificing, and tremendous struggles the world ever saw; both on the part of the rebels, and on the part of the loyal people of the United States. No other people upon earth could have so resisted, and no other people and no other Government could have overcome such resistance.

But we did overcome it. We did prevent the separation of these States from the Union by force. Every law of Congress, every act of the President, every blow we struck, every shot we fired, every drop of blood we shed, was not to thrust these States out, nor to open a way for them to go out, nor to reduce them to Territories, but to keep them as States in the Union, and compel them to remain in the Union under the Constitution. The flag of our country bears thirty-six stars, as the emblem of a Union of thirty-six States. Wherever it floats, over this Capitol, at the head of our armies, in the storm of battle, and in the hour of victory, over the sea as well as over the land, that sacred ensign, which, next to the God of heaven, we love and reverence as representing the good, the great, and the true, everywhere bears thirty-six stars, and thereby proclaims to the world the great, fundamental, national truth, there are thirty-six States in the Union, under the Constitution. Thirty-six States constitute that great Republic which the world calls the United States of America. Upon "that line" and under that flag we began the great campaign; upon that line and under that flag half a million of our sons and fathers and brothers have laid down their lives; upon that line and under that flag we fought it out to victory, and now, God helping me, I will continue to fight it out on that line and under that flag to the end, whoever else may abandon it.

[Applause in the galleries, which was checked by the Presiding Officer.]

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to address the Senate on the pending question, but it is now rather late.

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator from Oregon, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. NESMITH. I give way for that purpose.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CRESWELL. Before that motion is put, I desire to say a word with the permission of the Senate. I regret exceedingly that I was not in my seat yesterday when the vote was taken on the motion of my colleague to lay on the table the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] I regret it, sir, because if I had been present on that occasion I should have voted in favor of the motion of my colleague, and I should have done so in order to express my decided and unqualified approbation of the manner in which the President has seen proper to conduct the questions with relation to our foreign policy with the Government of Great Britain; and further to declare it to be my opinion that it is better for the interests of the nation that, for the present, all questions touching those matters should remain in precisely the same attitude in which the President has left them by his correspondence.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair asks the indulgence of the Senate to present two bills from the House for reference.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 40) directing the Secretary of War to postpone the sale of public property at Point Lookout, Maryland, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The bill (H. R. No. 84) to regulate the times and places of holding the district court of the United States within and for the district of Maine, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEWART. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports, the pending business being the bill reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary (H. R. No. 26) to incorporate the United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company, on which Mr. BOUTWELL was entitled to the floor.

DEPOSITS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. LONGYEAR, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House with what States, if any, deposits of the public money were made, under sections thirteen and fourteen of an act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," approved June 23, 1836, together with the dates and amounts of such deposits respectively, and whether the same, or any, and what amounts thereof still remain so deposited, and with what States respectively.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

DELEGATE FROM ARIZONA.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the credentials of Hon. JOHN N. GOODWIN, Delegate-elect from the Territory of Arizona, who is present and ready to take the oath.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am requested by a gentleman contesting the seat of that gentleman to ask to have the credentials read.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a statement connected with this matter.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, it may be made.

Mr. BLAINE. The election in Arizona took place on the first Wednesday in September last. The law of the Territory requires returns to be made, certified by the acting secretary of the Territory, to the Governor within a specified number of days. They were so certified, and the Governor of the Territory having himself the highest number of votes in the election, certified the returns and forwarded the credentials to the Clerk of this House, and his name was called on the roll on the first day of the session, just in the same manner that Representatives-elect were called. But unwilling to let it rest there, Mr. GOODWIN presents credentials in duplicate, certified by Mr. McCormick, then secretary, and now acting Governor of the Territory, which credentials I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the credentials, as follows:

THE GOVERNOR OF THE TERRITORY OF ARIZONA,

To all whom these presents come, greeting:
Whereas the assistant secretary of the Territory of Arizona, on the 21 day of October, A. D. 1865, has certified to me that returns have been received of the election held on the first Wednesday of September, A. D. 1865, for Delegate in Congress from this Territory for the term commencing March 4, 1865, from all the counties in said Territory, and that John N. Goodwin, in said Territory, has the largest number of votes: Therefore,

I hereby declare John N. Goodwin to be duly and legally elected Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Arizona for the term aforesaid.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the [L. S.] Territory of Arizona. Done at Prescott, this 30th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1865.

RICHARD C. McCORMICK,

Acting Governor.

Mr. GOODWIN then appeared and was qualified by taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States under the act of July 2, 1862.

BAYOU SARA MAIL COMPANY.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of the New Orleans Bayou Sara Mail Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DELEGATE FROM ARIZONA—AGAIN.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I present the memorial of Charles D. Poston, contesting the seat of Hon. JOHN N. GOODWIN as Delegate from the Territory of Arizona. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Elections, and printed.

Mr. DAWES. It is customary to refer such petitions to the Committee of Elections, and they are authorized to have printed such matter as they deem necessary.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, let it be referred.

The petition was referred to the Committee of Elections.

POINT LOOKOUT, MARYLAND.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a joint resolution, requesting the Secretary of War to suspend the sale of Government buildings and other property at Point Lookout, Maryland, and to ask the immediate action of the House upon it. I send the resolution to the Clerk's desk, and will make an explanation of the necessity of action at once, if there is to be action at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection if the morning hour has commenced.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not commenced. It was cut off by a question of privilege. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Judiciary. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do.

Mr. SCHENCK. Members of the House are probably all aware that Point Lookout is where the Potomac enters into Chesapeake bay. There are some three or four hundred acres of land there, upon which, before the war, there were buildings occupied as a watering-place—generally, or perhaps altogether, frame buildings. They were taken during the war for hospital purposes, and there was also established there a depot for prisoners. The buildings at that time were worth comparatively but a small sum to the owners or any one else; but the United States, during the war, expended at that place, in the construction of buildings and other improvements, perhaps at least $150,000. The Secretary of War has advertised for sale those improvements and buildings, and the furniture in the buildings, and other property of the Government now there; and that sale is to take place to-morrow. In the mean time a patriotic lady has secured a title to the property, and proposes to present that property as a donation to the National Naval and Military Asylum, which was incorporated last March by Congress, as a home for soldiers and sailors disabled in the service, provided the Government would also give this public property, consisting of the improvements made.

The subject was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but there has as yet been no time afforded to that committee to consider it. The subject only came before the committee this morning for investigation. What we ask now is that until Congress shall have time to look into the matter and consider the propriety of accepting the donation of this lady, the Secretary of War shall be directed to suspend this sale, which otherwise will go on to-morrow. If the sale takes place to-morrow, the probability is that $200,000 worth of property will be sold for a mere song. The sole object of the resolution is to stop the sale until there can be an investigation and action by Congress.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Hon. George M. Chillicott, claiming a seat in this House as member from Colorado, be admitted to the privileges of the floor pending the consideration of his claim.

CAPTAIN JOHN FAUNCE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Captain John Faunce; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MUTUAL HOMESTEAD COMPANY.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 26, to incorporate the United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company.

The pending question was upon agreeing to sundry amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The amendments reported from the Judiciary Committee are upon the desks of members in a printed form. I am further directed by the committee, informally, to move to amend one of the amendments of the committee by striking out the name of "Joshua Hill, Georgia;" the effect of which will be to restore him to the place he occupied in the original bill as one of the corporators. And I will also move to add the name of William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, to the list of corporators named in the bill. I will now call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] withdraw that call for a moment to allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROOMALL. I would call the attention of the gentleman to the provision in the third section, by which this corporation is permitted only, not required, to open books for the subscription of capital stock, and allow the public generally an opportunity to subscribe. I would ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to modify that section so as to make it obligatory on the corporation to open books. That can be done by striking out the words "whenever said company may deem it useful or necessary in prosecuting the objects aforesaid, they may," and insert the words "said company shall." And the fourth section should then be amended by striking out the words "until the company may provide for the subscription of stock." With that alteration I am willing to vote for the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no objection to the modifications suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope, as a new member here, I will not be deemed obtrusive in the desire to say to the House that my strong impression is that this bill should not pass, and to briefly state my reasons therefor.

First, this bill, as I understand it, creates what purports to be an eleemosynary corporation for charitable purposes, with proprietary rights in the corporators; this right of ownership becoming, by operation of law, absolute in the corporators at the end of five years. The money the corporation will receive as charitable contributions for the promotion of emigration, &c., may, under the terms of the bill, be invested in lands, the title of which will at once vest in the corporation, and the rents of which accrue to the corporation, or be loaned on landed security, the interest going to the corporation, and the principal, too, at the end of five years. This is what I understand the words of the bill will admit of, though I may be mistaken.

The bill confers an immense and exclusive privilege on a small number of persons to lease, purchase, hold, sub-let, and convey lands, and loan money, without limitation as to interest, on mortgage or pledge of growing crops, there being no effectual limitation as to the amount of land or money which may thus be held or loaned, for I do not understand the third section, or the fifth (amended) section, to be such a limitation. Those sections may be dispensed with almost entirely by the corporation; and if not dispensed with they are still not a proper limitation, for they provide for a capital stock of ten-dollar shares by subscription, and do not, after a nominal compliance with these sections, interfere with the receipt of donatives, the holding of lands, and the loaning of money on any interest and to any extent the company may desire under the powers given by the second section.

Secondly, this bill will be a precedent for corporations, for the conferring of special privileges on the few, which, if it becomes a law and is followed up, may lead the way to shingling the Republic over with corporate privileges originating in the central Government. This is a step toward consolidation which I am not prepared to take, and one which I fear would have a most pernicious influence on the institutions and liberties of the country. I do not want the policy of this Government brought under the influence of mammoth corporations of wealth and power, originating in the center and extending in long radii through and over the whole country. We can find a better cement of union than that. Nor will I be seduced to entering on such a course by any appeals to charity. We can find a better method of doing our legislative aims than that.

Thirdly, the power to pass such an act is exceedingly doubtful. The doctrine of McCulloch vs. State of Maryland, holding the constitutionality of the United States Bank, is as follows:

"The power of establishing a corporation is not a distinct sovereign power or end of government, but only the means of carrying into effect other powers which are sovereign. Whenever it becomes an appropriate means of exercising any of the powers given by the Constitution to the Government of the Union, it may be exercised by that Government."

And the powers cited for this purpose by Chief Justice Marshall, as authorizing the creation for a bank, were the powers to levy and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. In executing these powers the court thought a bank might, by implication, be incorporated; and the court places stress on the greatness of these powers and their vital importance to the existence and safety of the country. Now, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to state what part of the Constitution is relied on to justify the creation of the corporation provided for in this bill? I am persuaded the case cited will not cover the proposed corporation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now call the previous question, and if the call is sustained, I will then make some explanations to the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment, as this is a matter of great importance?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I propose, after the previous question is sustained, to take what time may be left of the morning hour for explanation of the bill.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope the previous question will not be sustained, and that important measures like this will not be forced through this House in this way.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Have I the right, Mr. Speaker, to a certain length of time after the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] having reported the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, has the right to open and close debate upon the bill. He will, therefore, be entitled to an hour after the previous question shall be seconded.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will not that cut off the remarks of other members who may desire to debate this bill?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. If they sustain the demand for the previous question it will indicate a desire to close debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to make his explanations before he calls the previous question, as upon those explanations might depend very much my vote upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well; if there is no objection, I will make such explanations as I am able to make, and such as may be desired by gentlemen; and the time may be considered as taken from what I would be entitled to use after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROOMALL. I must object to that, unless others are allowed to state their objections to this bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Has not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] the right to go on for an hour, then call the previous question, and if that call is sustained, close the debate with another hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has already used up the hour allowed him to open the debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should be glad to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, although I propose to settle the whole matter by moving to lay the bill and pending amendments on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In order to give members a further opportunity to consider this bill, and to debate it if they please, I will move to refer this bill with the pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair allows the gentleman from Massachusetts to occupy the floor till he decides what motion he will make. He will please decide as soon as possible. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] objects to further debate unless other members be allowed to take part in the debate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to settle this matter to-day if we can. I will therefore demand the previous question, although I would not do so under other circumstances.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the bill, with the pending amendments, be laid on the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 32, not voting 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos B. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawson, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeld, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—120.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Boutwell, Broomall, Dawes, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Morris, O'Neill, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Smith, Stevens, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Blow, Bundy, Cobb, Conkling, Culver, Dumont, Farnsworth, Grider, Harris, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Kelso, Ladin, Lynch, McIndoe, McKuer, Newell, Pike, Radford, Rousseau, Taber, John L. Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, and Wright—30.

Mr. SMITH. I move to reconsider the vote just taken. I desire that that motion shall be entered.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order, which is that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] has no right to make the motion to reconsider, as he did not vote with the prevailing side.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Kentucky vote with the prevailing side?

Mr. SMITH. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Kentucky has not the right to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. FINCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were laid on the table; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege. My colleague, Mr. NEWELL, is absent on account of the death of his uncle, and he will necessarily be away all the week. He had not the opportunity to obtain leave of absence before he went away. I now ask leave of absence for him.

Leave was granted.

DISTRICT COURT IN MAINE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 84) entitled "An act to regulate the times and places of holding the United States district court of the United States within and for the district of Maine."

The amendment reported by the committee, which was read, proposes to strike out the second section of the bill, as follows:

That, in addition to the salary now fixed by law for the judge of the United States district court for said district, there shall be allowed and paid him for his travel from the place of his abode to the said several places of holding said terms of said court, at the rate of twenty cents per mile for going and twenty cents per mile for returning.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendment will not prevail. The object of the bill is to make two additional terms of the court in different parts of the State. It increases the traveling expenses of the judge. The position he holds is a responsible one, necessitating large labor, and requiring judicial learning and capacity, both of which the judge now possesses in a high degree. The present salary is $2,000, a scanty sum, certainly, for such a place.

The effect of the amendment would be to pay the traveling expenses of the judge while holding his court in the remoter sections of the State, giving him but a small additional compensation. I cannot say how much, but perhaps a couple of hundred dollars a year. And I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will not concur with the committee, but will allow the section to stand as in the bill I presented.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the second section provides a mode for increasing the salary of the United States district judge for the district of Maine; but I think instead of increasing the compensation of the judge only $200 a year, it will increase it from five hundred to a thousand dollars a year. It will be observed that the mileage provided in the section is twenty cents per mile.

The Judiciary Committee have reported against all propositions to increase the compensation of judges of United States courts, not because it was believed they are paid such salaries as persons should receive in positions of that kind, but because the House has invariably voted down propositions of this character. We have propositions from other sources to increase the salaries of other judges; and we presumed it to be best in this first report to report adversely as an indication of what will follow in all other cases.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I will say, with the gentleman's permission, that I spoke somewhat at random about the sum necessary to pay travel as provided in the bill, and if he has made calculations it may be that he is nearer right than I am. If so, I am willing to modify my proposition so far as to take one half the amount he names.

This is not an ordinary case of increase of pay, because the bill imposes additional duties, and those additional duties consist of this additional travel, involving additional expense.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not fix the amount of increase of salary in the bill so that we may understand exactly what it is?

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to that. I am willing that it shall be provided the increase shall not exceed a certain sum in any one year.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that this House has not uniformly been opposed to increasing the salaries of judges. I remember, in the district in which I live, the salary of the judge has been increased within three years; perhaps more recently; within two years. I doubt very much whether the House would now object to an increase of salary so much as they object to an indirect increase, which may be more, or which may be less.

Mr. PIKE. To meet the views of the gentleman from New York, I will move to add that the additional pay shall not exceed the sum of $300 in any one year.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot accept that modification of the amendment of the committee; but I am willing to allow the sense of the House to be taken on the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I will say, with the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, one word further on this subject. This bill calls for the holding of court at places more than two hundred miles distant from the residence of the judge, a great part of the way by stage route, so that the expenses to be incurred by the judge in holding these additional terms approximate, if they do not exceed, the proposed addition to his salary. I now move the amendment which I have suggested, that the increase shall not exceed $300 in any one year.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If this court be abolished, the $300 will go on.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The House divided on Mr. PIKE's amendment; and there were—yeas 71, nays 23.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on striking out the section as amended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to inquire where the court is now held.

Mr. PIKE. In Portland, Wiscasset, and Bangor.

Mr. STEVENS. How large will the circuit be?

Mr. PIKE. From Portland, where the judge resides, to Machias—some two hundred miles.

Mr. STEVENS. Over those corduroy roads?

Mr. PIKE. A great portion of it is by stage.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maine what salary the judge now receives.

Mr. PIKE. Two thousand dollars.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 73, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Davis, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Denison, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Kelso, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Marston, McClurg, McKee, Morrill, Morris, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Seefeld, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stillwell, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Chanler, Conkling, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Nicholson, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Schenck, Spalding, Stevens, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Warner, Windom, and Winfield—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Boyer, Brooks, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Culver, Dumont, Grider, Griswold, Harris, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Julian, Laffin, McIndoe, McKuer, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Radford, Rousseau, Shanklin, Smith, Taber, John L. Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Wentworth, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—37.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The morning hour having expired, the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; on which Mr. DARLING was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DARLING] to yield to me a moment, that I may make a brief statement in regard to the bill under consideration.

Mr. DARLING. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Several gentlemen desire to be heard on this bill, and yet I think we may at this time fix an hour for taking a vote on the pending question. I suggest, therefore, that half past three o'clock to-morrow be fixed as the time for taking the vote. I believe the gentlemen who desire yet to be heard will have ample time, if we fix that hour, to make their speeches. Of course I desire, after the debate is closed, time to reply, if I find it necessary to do so.

I wish to state in addition that, in order that there may be a full understanding, I accept the amendment moved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to my motion to recommit the bill, in order that there may be a vote had upon that motion, with the instruction thus included. It was my intention, when I made the motion, to withdraw it without asking a vote on it; but several gentlemen desire a vote upon this instruction, and therefore, for the purpose of enabling them to have that vote, I accept the amendment, so as to allow the vote upon that motion to recommit with instruction:

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to be in favor of the amendment, or only of allowing the motion to be made?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That motion is already pending. I shall myself vote against the motion thus modified. But I desire to afford gentlemen an opportunity to vote upon it, as many of them I know desire that I should do so. Therefore, at the time I suggested to-morrow, I shall move the previous question on the question.

Mr. CONKLING. Before my colleague proceeds, I ask him to yield to me not exceeding five minutes.

Mr. DARLING. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I avail myself of the courtesy of my colleague to save the trouble of answering by letter some inquiries and misunderstanding with regard to a proposed constitutional amendment which I introduced a day or two ago. By inadvertence no doubt, for which nobody is to blame, the report in the Associated Press mangled the amendment into nonsense. The two amendments proposed in alternative are in the report fused into one, and misstated in addition. A special dispatch to the Tribune implies that the point of the amendment is to confine the basis of representation to "citizens" as distinguished from "persons." I beg to say, therefore, first, that the purpose is not at all to restrict the basis of representation to citizens. No such point as that was considered at all as the object aimed at in preparing the amendment. That question is foreign from the spirit of the amendment; entirely independent of it. The use of the word "person" or the word "citizen" disposes of that question in all amendments on this subject alike; and the one basis or the other does not enter into the motive or object of my proposition. The idea is wholly different. My sole purpose is to get rid of the present injustice and inequality of representation between different sections of the country, arising from the fact that four million people who have now no political rights are, in the present condition of things, to be represented in Congress whenever southern Representatives shall be admitted to seats. The entire object is to devise such a mode of adjusting representation that if race or color is made a ground for withholding political or civil rights the consequence shall be to deduct the whole of that race from the enumeration upon which political power is based. Its excellence, if it has any, consists in the fact that it prevents evasion, and insures the nation against votes to be cast in Congress in future on account of those who in truth have no political status in the country.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask the gentleman to allow the amendment offered by him, and recorded on the Journal of yesterday, to be read, because unless I seriously misapprehended it, it provides that representation shall be determined by counting the whole number of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Most certainly that was its form, and it is not necessary to take up time to read it, as the gentleman would have seen had he been within hearing when I commenced my remarks. I had already explained that that question is wholly aside from the purpose of the measure. The amendment is the same, as to the real point of it, whether the word "persons" or "citizens" be inserted. "Citizens" was in the copy sent up only pro forma. My own preference and judgment are for "persons," not for "citizens," in this connection. I return now to the explanation that the whole point of the amendment was to exclude from the basis of representation the entire race, no matter what it may be, which, or any part of which, is excluded from political standing on account of race or color. I agree with my friend from Maine that it ought to be "persons," although the amendment now reads "citizens."

I am much obliged to my colleague for yielding to me to make this explanation.

Mr. DARLING. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House on the bill now under consideration with any extended remarks, but a few practical ideas have suggested themselves to my mind which I thought I would embrace the very first opportunity to lay before them for their consideration. Washington, lying within the District of Columbia, is the capital of the nation; it is the fountain of the nation's law, as it is the property of the people of the United States. The representatives of the people in Congress assembled are in some degree supposed to reflect the varied political sentiments of their various constituents, as this magnificent pile and the other public buildings mark the liberality and taste of the people.

Now, sir, it is well known that the sentiments of the people of this country on the proposed question of colored suffrage are as varied as the shades of the people themselves. I would ask what public necessity exists for the passage of this bill at this time? There are no benefits which the colored people of this District could attain by the exercise of the right of suffrage that Congress could not bestow. Our right and power to legislate for this District are unquestioned, and instead of wasting days and weeks over a question which is exciting bitter feeling among our own people, had we not better give our attention to matters of great national interest which so urgently demand speedy action on our part? Let us pass laws for the education of the people of this District, and fit them ultimately to receive the elective franchise; or, if anything is required to satisfy the intense desire manifested by some gentlemen of this House to bestow the franchise on those not now possessed of it, give it to every soldier who served in the Union Army and was honorably discharged, whether old or young, rich or poor, native or foreign-born, white or black, and show to the world that the American people, recognizing the services and sufferings of their brave defenders, give them as a recognition the highest and best gift of American citizenship.

If I know myself, I know that no unjust or unmanly prejudice warps my judgment or controls my action on any matter of legislation affecting the colored race on this continent. I believe in their equality of rights before the law with the dominant race. I believe in their rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And yet I believe that before we confer upon them the political right of suffrage, as contemplated by the bill now under consideration, we should seek to elevate their social condition, and lift them up from the depths of degradation and ignorance in which many of them are left by the receding waves of the sea of rebellion. There are many strong objections to conferring upon the colored men of this District the gift of unqualified suffrage without any qualification based on intelligence. The large preponderance which they possess numerically will inevitably lead to mischievous results. Neither would I entirely disregard the views of the people of this District, many of whom I know to be sound, loyal Union men.

I am proud of my State, proud of her record in the war. Look at the number of men she has put in the field—nearly half a million. I am proud of my city of New York, where I have resided nearly half a century. Democratic in politics though she may be, yet she was not wanting in patriotism. She has done her full share, ay, more than any other community, perhaps, in supplying not only men but means. Look at the vast treasure which she poured into the lap of the national Treasury. When did the nation ever appeal to her for national aid, and she refused the demand, and turned the nation away empty-handed? Where would the country have found the means to carry on that gigantic struggle but for the moneyed men of New York? Where would we have been had they not supplied the sinews of war? Yet she has steadily refused to grant unqualified suffrage to the black race, although their number is so small that it could not possibly have affected any election in the remotest degree.

I am proud of the State of New York, and the city of New York, for the toleration shown in all the essentials of liberty. New York does not deny to the colored man his civil rights. With a population strongly tinged with prejudice against this long-oppressed people, she permits them to share the privileges of her public vehicles, notwithstanding her sister Republican city of Philadelphia insists upon refusing that privilege to the colored man, although attired in the clean and simple garb of its founder, William Penn.

Sir, whenever the question of negro suffrage has been submitted to the people of my State, I have voted always and steadily for that amendment, unqualifiedly and unhesitatingly. And yet, under the existing circumstances which surround this question in this District, I am not in favor of giving the colored man here the right of suffrage without imposing an educational qualification. The proper qualification I consider odious, and disregard it entirely.

But I do not wish to see the Union party take any step in this direction from which they may desire hereafter to recede. Let us first rather seek to enlighten this people, and educate them to know the value of the great gift of liberty which has been bestowed upon them; teach them to know that to labor is for their best interests; teach them to learn and lead virtuous and industrious lives, in order to make themselves respected, and encourage them to act as becomes freemen. Then they will vote intelligently, and not be subject to the control of designing men, who would seek to use them for the attainment of their own selfish ends.

My honored and learned friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who addressed this House with so much force and eloquence on Monday, has, in my judgment, substantially covered the points in the case, and expressed what I believe to be the mature judgment of the majority of this House. Yet I think he was mistaken upon one point, in regard to the position the colored soldiers occupied in the closing scenes of the rebellion. I know him too well to believe that he would do the colored soldiers any injustice, or refuse to accord to them their full share of honor; nor do I believe that he intended to be so understood. If I mistake not, it was the colored troops who first entered, or at least entered simultaneously with the white troops, the city of Richmond after its evacuation, led as they were by an honored son of New York.

And, sir, let us go back five long, weary years of the war, when our heroic Army, passing through this city, penetrated into the home of slavery. As they passed on over the country, back came a swelling tide of dusty, weary, worn pilgrims, wending their way to the capital of the nation, the Mecca of their hopes, their ark of safety, their refuge and abiding-place, where no slave-driver's lash could longer print in letters of blood upon the quivering flesh of their unresisting victim the record of his own brutality and of slavery's infamy. And when the glad shout rang out over the land that here the representatives of the people had given liberty to this down-trodden and long-suffering people, and declared that here no man should longer hold in bondage his fellow-man, then on they came from the country wide and far, pressing in and on, eager to seek a home where they could breathe freedom's inspiring air, until now in numbers great they affect the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I desire to say that as no election will take place in this District until next June, there can be no reason for special haste in the passage of this bill, and that there is a proposition before this House, which seems to be received with very general favor, to create a commission for the government of this city; and in order to give an opportunity to mature a bill for that purpose, and have it presented for the consideration of this House, I move the postponement of the pending bill until the first Tuesday in April next.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] begins his remarks, I beg to be allowed to suggest that, by general consent, the vote on the motion to postpone shall not be taken until to-morrow.

Mr. DARLING. I do not desire to press my motion to a vote until the motion of the gentleman from Iowa comes up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that neither motion will be pressed to a vote until to-morrow at half past three o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, the debate before the House having taken a wide range, I beg leave to ask for the reading of the amendment which I had the honor to submit the other day, and which constitutes, as I understand, the question before the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amend the motion to recommit by adding to that motion an instruction to the committee to amend the bill so as to extend the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia to all persons coming within either of the following classes, irrespective of caste or color, but subject only to existing provisions and qualifications other than those founded on caste or color, to wit:

1. Those who can read the Constitution of the United States.

2. Those who are assessed for and pay taxes on real or personal property within the District.

3. Those who have served in and been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States.

And to restrict such right of suffrage to the classes above named, and to include proper provisions excluding from the right of suffrage those who have borne arms against the United States during the late rebellion, or given aid and comfort to said rebellion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House strikes me as one eminently practical in its nature—not one of theory, not one to be decided according to any hypothesis as to general rights or general forms of government. The Constitution of the United States vests in Congress exclusive jurisdiction for the purpose of legislation over this District. The jurisdiction thus vested in us we cannot abdicate.

We do not propose to abdicate it. We simply propose to delegate certain local and administrative powers to the inhabitants of this District, or some of them, in such manner as we shall deem best. This bill does not propose to commit to the people of the District, or to anybody except this Congress, any power of general legislation. We are endeavoring merely to find out to whom we may best delegate the control of certain municipal affairs having relation to schools, poor-laws, streets, inferior courts of justice, police, and the like, and the simple question, as it seems to me, which addresses itself to this House, and should address itself to every member of the House, is, what is the best, the most feasible, plan, all things considered, for the accomplishment of this work?

Theoretical questions as to inalienable or inherent rights of suffrage or anything else do not, I think, arise here. The jurisdiction lies in us; the authority emanates from us. Whoever receives it from us receives it as a free gift—of grace, (if I may be allowed the expression,) not of right. I confess that, for one, I have little sympathy with those who uniformly appeal to theoretical and abstract questions of right and wrong as the sole guides for our course in legislative affairs. I do not believe that statesmanship is founded exclusively, or even mainly, on theoretical propositions. I believe that true statesmanship must learn to regard the facts and circumstances surrounding every proposition; must learn to look at the things which bear upon it in all directions; must learn that abstractions and theories must yield from time to time to the circumstances of the case. I do not even believe it wise for statesmen always to insist on what they may consider as purely abstract right. While I would never abandon or yield a principle which I deemed as right and of vital and essential importance, I would consider that we live in a world where all our efforts must be more or less tinged with imperfection—that we must not expect always to have that which we would consider under all circumstances the most highly desirable thing, but we must learn to be satisfied with taking the best that we can attain.

Hence it is that I regret to have heard expressions from members of my own party, in this House and out of it, indicating that they will insist upon their own peculiar views as to the details of this question, to the exclusion of all others, and that they are ready to ally themselves with our political antagonists for the purpose of defeating this proposition, which they think comes in some measure short of their own theories.

I believe, sir, we ought to try to harmonize our own views, that each ought to be willing to yield something of his personal impressions to meet the views of his associates upon this floor, and that by that course, and that course alone, we will attain to wise system of legislation here.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard much said on this floor of conservatism and of radicalism. I do not know, sir, that I understand the meaning attached to those words here. I am raw in parliamentary usage and unused to parliamentary nomenclature. I can only say for one, as I understand the true meaning of those words, there is no conflict between the purest and loftiest conservatism and the purest and profoundest radicalism. It has pleased friends of mine upon this floor to call me a conservative; and it has pleased friends of mine in other places to call me a radical. With my own construction of those words, I am willing to claim as well as to accept both appellations. If it be radicalism to favor an eradication of wrong, of everything that is unjust, of everything that is prejudicial to the public interests, from our political system just as fast as a due regard to the life and constitution of the patient under treatment may permit, then most certainly I claim to be a radical. If it be conservatism to desire to preserve in full force and strength all that is excellent—and it is almost all excellent—in our political system, then most certainly I claim to be a conservative.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the question before this House concerns exclusively the negro. If it did, I should be likely to express an opinion which I have sometimes before entertained, that perhaps the negro was engrossing a larger proportion of our time and attention than his comparative numerical force in this country or the extent of his interests here fairly entitled him to. I do not claim to be peculiarly or exclusively the friend of the negro. As belonging to the white race, connected with it by the ties of consanguinity, affinity, association, and habit, I may be pardoned for my preference for the white race. On the other hand, I have no sympathy with the propositions put forth at times from the other side of the House, that this is exclusively a white man's Government, and that no black man is to be recognized as a citizen here. I deny it utterly. I believe, when the Declaration of Independence put forth those principles so familiar to us all, it put them forth on behalf of all men, and not merely on behalf of white men.

But, again, I repel all the charges which have been made upon myself, and upon those who agree with me, from this side of the House, of being hostile to the black race or unmindful of their rights. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] yesterday, in the course of his elaborate and able discussion of this question, charged that those who were in favor of restricting suffrage as proposed by these amendments were impelled to that course by hate of the negro; that it was his color and not his ignorance they feared; and he referred to negro-hating constitutions, as he was pleased to term them, represented by conservative gentlemen upon this floor. For myself and my constituents I repel the charge, and I challenge him to answer by what authority he accuses me and my constituents of hating any portion of God's human creation.

It was with feelings almost of pain, almost of indignation, that I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] the other day, in the course of his speech, use the name of Frederick Douglass, a colored man most widely known and most highly respected, in a connection I could not but consider as derogatory and insulting to him.

The gentleman saw fit to select the name of a person designated by him as the type and embodiment of all that was offensive to all his ideas of loyalty and worth, Mr. Fernando Wood, and to place him on a level with Mr. Douglass, as the type and embodiment of all that is worthy and excellent in the colored race. I neither indorse or repudiate the position the gentleman saw fit to assign to Mr. Wood, but I earnestly protest against such a compliment to Mr. Douglass. For myself, I can only say that the radicalism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] falls far short of my own conservatism. I know nothing in Frederick Douglass that should induce the gentleman from Illinois, or myself, or any other member of this House, to be the highest or proudest in it in intellectual or social position, to consider himself in any degree disgraced or dishonored by occupying a seat by the side of Frederick Douglass on this floor or elsewhere.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask whether the gentleman from Illinois did not beg pardon of Mr. Douglass for making such a comparison.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will excuse me. His question is too far outside the range of my discussion for me to answer it here.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to explain?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the gentleman has referred to me, I will state that I deem it highly proper, in a discussion of this kind, in using figures of comparison, to take extreme cases. If I recollect right, however, at the time I made the comparison I expressly asked, pardon of Frederick Douglass for using his name in that connection. I am very happy to have had occasion to speak in commendation of that gentleman, both as to his ability and his character.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, in order to weigh the comparative merits of the two propositions now before the House, let me recur briefly to the nature of those propositions, the condition of the District and the community to which they are applicable, and then I will briefly consider some of the objections that are put forth to my own amendments as proposed.

This District contains a population of very mixed character—a white population, which is now the sole depository of political power, undoubtedly embracing all those grades of population that most of our large cities contain, from extreme wealth, high intelligence, and cultivation, down to the lowest poverty, want, vice, and degradation. It contains a black population embracing almost as wide a sweep of distinction, a large part of which, I venture to say, from my own personal observation, is an educated, intelligent population, perfectly capable of appreciating the political questions which from time to time come before the country, and questions that may be referred to them for their action in their municipal organizations, as in an average community of white men the country over. It contains a population of black taxpayers numbered by hundreds, assessed for property amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars. All these are now excluded from the right of suffrage.

On the other hand, it contains a black population which, undoubtedly, approaches to the very extreme of ignorance and degradation. Not necessarily vicious, but necessarily ignorant, extremely ignorant, and consequently, as a matter of course, vicious to a greater or less degree; a population that has come into this District suddenly, just freed from slavery, with all the marks of the burdens upon them that a state of slavery necessarily fixes upon its victims.

Now the question is submitted to us, how are we to deal with all these different classes?

Four courses, in substance, are open to this Congress, and I see but four. 1. To let the right of suffrage remain where it now is, exclusively in the whites. 2. To change that basis but still retain the present distinction, in some degree, at least, greater or less, between white and black; that is, leaving the right to be unequally exercised by the two races. 3. To extend suffrage equally and universally to white and black. 4. To extend suffrage equally and impartially to white and black, with limitations and restrictions for the purpose of excluding improper persons.

In what I have already said I have sufficiently expressed my own views as to the first two propositions I have here named—either to retain the present system, or to perpetuate the distinction of race or color in some form. To each of these I am opposed under all circumstances.

Now, sir, who are the parties interested in this question? Not merely the black, although their interest in it is great; not merely the inhabitants of this District, though their interest in it, too, is great. The nation is interested in it as the proprietor of this District, its creator, the Federal Government, whose location of its capital here has in fact made what there is of Washington city. More than that, the officers of the Government have a peculiar personal interest in this question; the members of the executive, the legislative, the judicial, and the administrative departments of the Government, all of whom spend more or less of their lives here each year, these are peculiarly interested in the question, how best shall a firm, temperate, vigorous municipal government be sustained in this District?

The propositions which I submit are based in my own mind solely upon this practical view of the question. I have not introduced these propositions from any political purpose, from any desire to make political capital out of them. I put them forward as containing, in my view, the safest and best basis of a system on which the municipal affairs of this District should be administered.

I propose, first, that those who can read may vote. I have listened to many of the objections raised to this proposition, and I receive with all allowance and consideration objections that have been made from different quarters.

It is objected by members from the West that they could not stand upon this proposition at home, because among the pioneers of the West there is a large class of intelligent persons who are wholly uneducated in books. It is objected to by gentlemen from Massachusetts that although an educational test is successful there, it is not applicable under the state of things here, for the opposite reason; that in Massachusetts there is and long has been in operation a system of education so universal, so complete, so abundant in its resources that the educational test is practically of no importance there, for in effect all vote.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that these two objections answer each other as far as they go. It is a sufficient answer to each of them to say that this proposition does not affect the right of suffrage in Illinois nor the right of suffrage in Massachusetts. It is a question simply as to this District in its present condition and with its present population.

Sir, I entirely disclaim the idea that whatever basis we may establish for the exercise of the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia is necessarily to be taken as applicable to any State of the Union. For myself, I say with frankness that in my own State I would propose a different basis, for the reason that my own State stands under different circumstances and with a different population.

It is objected that this proposition is to be viewed with suspicion on account of its origin. It is said that the educational qualification in Massachusetts is a bequest from the late lamented Know-Nothing party. Well, Mr. Speaker, I confess that if anything is calculated to give me a prejudice against it, that is it. I have not, and never had, any sympathy with the Know-Nothing party. I apprehend, however, that there are many gentlemen upon this floor who will discover nothing to excite prejudice in their minds to this measure in the fact of its origin there; and wherever it originated, as I never held to the dogma that no good can come out of Nazareth, I am willing to take it without regard to its origin. I have listened to words of wisdom upon this floor from gentlemen whom I recognize as former prominent members of the Know-Nothing party, both on this side of the Hall and upon the other.

It was argued at length by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] in his speech yesterday, that education is not a perfect and complete test of the right of suffrage. Most certainly I should never claim that it was. I do not know any systems of human government that are perfect. Perhaps they have them in Indiana. I certainly know of none elsewhere. But will it be contended that education is not presumptively a better test of fitness to exercise the right of suffrage than ignorance? Will it be contended that of five hundred men who can read, and the same number who cannot read, taken at random, the former will not include a larger number fitted to exercise the right of suffrage than the latter? I have certainly never pretended that it was an infallible test. It is one of the things we take as an approximation, as the best thing we can do toward securing a fair test.

My next proposition is that tax-payers in this District shall have the right of suffrage, whether they can read or not. My first proposition covers all that can read; and next I say that tax-payers shall vote whether they can read or not. This is met with most strenuous objection from different quarters. Gentlemen seem struck with a sudden horror of the idea that a man may vote when he has property and pays taxes, and not when he has not. Why, Franklin's jackass has been trotted out on this floor by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] and has been put through his paces several times since. He is an animal that has made a great deal of noise from the time of Balaam down to the present. I do not think it follows that he is an animal whose lead it is worthy to follow. I submit that there is a sound, well-considered reason for this provision in my amendment. The man who owns property and pays taxes upon it in this District has by that very fact an interest in the administration of the Government here that should entitle him to a voice in it, and in the laying of taxes and the disbursement and application of the revenues derived from them.

But gentlemen say the connection between property and suffrage is odious. I would like to ask gentlemen if the connection between taxation and representation is and has been for the last hundred years so odious a thing in this country. I have an impression that within the hundred years past this country has taken very decided position on the idea that there was a very proper connection between taxation and representation.

Bear in mind that I do not propose a property qualification here as a restriction upon suffrage, but as an extension of it. I take the basis which Massachusetts has laid down for her citizens, and in addition to all they give, extend the right of suffrage to all those who pay taxes; not simply on the ground suggested heretofore by my colleague from the Uca district, [Mr. CONKLING,] not entirely on the ground that it is evidence of thrift, and that thrift is evidence of such sagacity, prudence, and wisdom as fit its possessor for the exercise of the right of suffrage, although there is sound philosophy in that idea; but I put it on the further ground that the tax-payer has an interest to protect, a substantial right upon which he is entitled to be heard.

And next, upon an entirely different ground, I propose to give the right of suffrage to those who have served in the military or naval service of the country and have been honorably discharged. This stands on no ground of peculiar fitness, or having an interest to protect; but simply on the ground that the very fact that men have honorably served their country in arms does entitle them to the favorable consideration of Congress; and as a matter of gratitude we may fairly extend to the discharged soldiers of our loyal armies the right of suffrage. It is very probable that in certain cases this may give the right to improper individuals. Our armies are undoubtedly not made up exclusively of the most correct, moral, and refined portion of the community. But in the mass I venture to say they are not unworthy of the boon it is proposed to confer upon them.

My amendments also propose another qualification, or rather another exclusion. That is, that those who have been in arms against this nation during the late rebellion, or who have acted in aid or comfort of that rebellion, shall be prohibited from voting. Objection has been made to this proposition, and the question has been asked of me whether I believe that reconstruction is possible in the southern States with the exclusion of all who have been in arms against the Government. My answer to this is the same that it has been upon other propositions; that whatever may be the rule applied to this District, it by no means follows that that rule is to be applied to the States of this Union. And I say unqualifiedly that I would not seek to enforce such a rule upon the southern States when they shall come back to their proper relations to this Government. But in regard to this District it does strike me that there is a peculiar fitness and propriety in this provision. Men who went from this District, residents and voters here, and joined the armies of the traitors, have no palliation whatever, nothing to urge. They are traitors of the deepest dye. The flimsy pretense of allegiance to State authority, under which so many from the southern States sought to cover their defection from and treason to their country, had no application here. The rebels who went from this District were subjects of the General Government, and of the General Government alone. They were traitors and parricides, without any sort of excuse, any sort of color or pretense, on any doctrine of State rights, for their treason. They, therefore, should certainly not be treated by us with any consideration in regard to rights in this District.

But when we come to commit to the hands of those whom we select, delegated power from ourselves, to be exercised in this District, I submit that we may with great propriety say we will submit these powers, entirely within our discretion, entirely within our control, to the men in whose loyalty we are entitled to have confidence.

Another objection that is made to my amendment is that it disfranchises men who have heretofore been entitled to vote in this District. It does so; and I have but two things to say on this subject. It is urged by some that the right of suffrage is in the nature of a vested right; and that when a man votes once there is at least something peculiarly hard, if not entirely unconstitutional, in taking that right from him. I recognize no such vested rights. When seeking to establish a municipal government upon a proper basis, I see no force in the argument that we are to allow all improper persons who voted a year ago to vote now, simply because they voted then. It seems to me, with deference to gentlemen, that that is a conservatism of evil, and not a conservatism of good.

And more than that, there is another reason that I think ought to have weight here, why this disfranchising clause must be included in any proper bill here. That is, if you omit this clause you do of necessity draw a distinction between the black and the white. Under the law as it stood a year ago it was only the white man who could vote here, and if we say that all who voted a year ago shall vote now, we extend the privilege to white persons while we exclude the blacks possessing the same qualification; we allow all the class of white voters to vote, although by our action here we declare them unfit to vote, and do this to the exclusion of the blacks. I believe that the only way to remedy this evil and to arrive at a fair and just system here is to include, as I propose, a disfranchising clause as to all whom we regard as not fairly qualified, putting all on a level as to present qualifications.

Mr. Speaker, I have already occupied more time than I intended, in endeavoring to vindicate the propositions which I have submitted to the House. I wish to say, in conclusion, that of the details of my amendment I am by no means tenacious. I do not expect to bring every member of the House, or even every member on this side of the House, to concur in all my own views. I desire simply to put my measures fairly before the House, and to advocate them as I best can. I am ready and willing to yield my own preferences in matters of detail to their better judgment. More than that, I shall not follow the example that has been set by some on this side of the House who oppose my amendment, and who claim to be the peculiar friends of negro suffrage, by proclaiming that I will adhere to the doctrine of qualified suffrage, and will join our political enemies, the Democrats, in voting down everything else. No, sir; for one, and I say it with entire frankness, I prefer a restricted and qualified suffrage substantially upon the basis that I have proposed. If the voice of this House be otherwise—if the sentiment of this Congress be that it is more desirable that universal suffrage should be extended to all within this District, then, for one, I say most decidedly I am for it rather than to leave the matter in its present condition, or to disfranchise the black race in this District. And in doing this I shall put myself fairly and frankly upon the record as voting for unqualified and unrestrained negro suffrage in the District. I shall resort to no such flimsy subterfuge as to claim that it is not a question of negro suffrage, because the word negro is not contained in the bill. A bill whose only effect is to enable negroes to vote where they could not vote before, is in fact, call it by whatever name you please, a bill for negro suffrage, and whether it receives my vote or not, I shall never fear or hesitate to call it by that name.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know, or have reason to believe, that there are many members of this House who agree with me in my preference for limited suffrage who will not go with me in voting for universal suffrage if our own preference is defeated. I appeal to gentlemen to consider whether there is not great danger, if gentlemen persist in following out their own preferences and determine to take nothing else, that all the remedies which we seek to attain by either of these measures may be entirely lost. As has been indicated in the House, and out of it, we may come to the ground between the two propositions. That, sir, would be a result which I should most heartily deprecate. I desire to see inaugurated in this District such measures as shall put its population upon a fair and just footing in regard to the exercise of political rights, and shall greatly regret if the measure be lost by the tenacious adherence of its friends to their individual differences of opinion.

Gentlemen have referred here repeatedly to the question as to how far gentlemen will be indorsed by their constituents in their action on this subject. The question is raised from time to time, will such a constituency sustain its Representative in such a course? Sir, I believe in the propriety of always considering duly this question; but when gentlemen tell me that the Union party is going to be ruined by the adoption of universal suffrage, or of restricted suffrage, or of a property qualification in the District of Columbia, and that the American people will not sustain any such proposition, I tell gentlemen, with all deference to the superior knowledge which every man is supposed to have of his own district, that, in my humble judgment, they misjudge the temper and character of the American people. No, sir, I do not believe that there is a district in this Union to which a Representative, having cast his vote consistently, honestly, boldly, either for universal or for qualified suffrage, cannot go back to his constituents confident of their approval. I should deem it an insult to my constituents to intimate that I doubted whether they would sustain me in a course which I took honestly and fairly on a question of policy, not involving the great principles of the party.

The Union party, sir, send here representatives of its great principles; they expect those men to stand by those principles; and no man, I trust, is in any danger of failing to do so. So long as a Representative is true to those great principles, the Union party is not to scan his acts with suspicion and distrust, and call him to account for this vote and that. If I dreamed it possible for my constituency to entertain a question of that kind, I can only say, that whenever the question was raised, and they saw fit to record their disapproval of my course in reference to a question not involving any principle of the party, I should retire from this House to private life with greater satisfaction than any other person in my district, or out of it, could have in my retirement.

Mr. DARLING. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. DARLING. I desire to ask him whether there is not in the State of New York a qualified suffrage, a discrimination as against the colored people, and whether the Union or Republican party of that State is not on record as against the property qualification required of colored men there to enable them to be voters; whether that party is not in favor of abolishing that property qualification.

Mr. HALE. I answer my colleague that I do not pretend to be thoroughly informed as to the history of any political party. I have no knowledge that either the Republican or the Union party in the State of New York is, or ever has been, on record for the repeal of the present constitutional provision. It may all have been.

Mr. DARLING. I desire to say to the House, with the gentleman's permission, that there is no reason why we should be in a particular hurry to pass this bill now before the House, as the election in this District does not take place until the month of June. And at that election no one can vote who has not been registered for six months. Therefore, under the election law of this District, the passage of this bill would be a mockery, a farce, a delusion, and a snare, so far as the negro population are concerned.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the measure before the House is of so much importance that, notwithstanding the length of the discussion to which it has given rise, I am unwilling that it should close without a brief statement of the reasons which influence my own conclusions and justify to my own judgment and conscience the vote which I shall give.

The proposition contained in this bill is a new proposition. It contemplates a change which will be a landmark in the history of this country—a landmark which, if it is set up, will be regarded by the present and future generations of men who are to inhabit this continent with pride and satisfaction, or deplored as one of the gravest errors in the history of legislation. The bill, if it shall become a law, will be, like the law to amend the Constitution by abolishing slavery, the deep foot-print of an advancing civilization, or the conspicuous monument of an unwise and pernicious experiment. I have considered it under a deep sense of the responsibility which its importance imposes upon me. I have in its consideration endeavored to divest myself of all partisan influences and personal prejudices. If I err, my judgment may be arraigned, but my conscience will be clear.

The proposition which is submitted to us is free from any constitutional embarrassment. This is admitted on all hands. It is clearly within the scope of our constitutional powers. The action proposed is undoubtedly an exercise of lawful authority. The question to be solved is, is it consistent with justice, and is it demanded by the best interests of the people of the United States? Much has been said, on the part of those who oppose the bill, on the subject of its injustice to the white inhabitants of the District of Columbia. Indeed, the argument on that side of the question is, when divested of all that is immaterial, meretricious, and extravagant, reduced almost entirely to that single position. Abstract this from the excited declamation to which you have listened, and what is left is but the old revolting argument in favor of slavery, and a selfish appeal to prejudice and ignorance. It is insisted that a majority of the white voters of the District are opposed to the contemplated law, that they have recently given a public expression of their opinion against it, and that for that reason it would be unjust and oppressive in Congress to pass this law. I do not know how far that alleged expression of opinion may be considered as fair and impartial, or precisely what value is to be attached to it as an expression of popular sentiment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] informs us that those who were in favor of the law abstained from voting. But, conceding to it all the force which is claimed for it, let me say, sir, that in my judgment this is a question not concerning alone the wishes and prejudices of the seven thousand voters who dwell in this District, but involving, it may be, the honor, the justice, the good faith, and the magnanimity of the great nation which makes this little spot the central seat of its empire and its power.

If it concerns the honor of the United States that a certain class of its people, in a portion of its territory subject to its exclusive jurisdiction and control, shall, in consideration of the change which has taken place in its condition and of the fidelity which it has exhibited in the midst of great and severe trials, be elevated somewhat above the political degradation which has hitherto been its lot, shall the United States be prevented from the accomplishment of that great and generous purpose by the handful of voters who temporarily encamp under the shadow of the Capitol? It may be that the determination of a question of so much importance as this belongs rather to the people of the United States, through their Representatives in Congress assembled, than to the present qualified voters of this District. Sir, the field of inquiry is much wider than the District of Columbia, and the problem to be solved one in which not they alone are interested. When Congress determined that the time had come when slavery should be abolished in this District, and the capital of the nation should no longer be disgraced by its presence, did it pause in the great work of justice to which it laid its hand to hear from the mayor of Washington, or to inquire whether the masters would vote for it? It is not difficult to conjecture what the fate of that great measure would have been had its adoption or rejection depended upon the voters of this District. Would any one restore that reproach to the capital of the United States now, even though Washington and Georgetown should cast seven thousand votes for it and thirty-six against it?

The power which is given by the Constitution to Congress to exercise exclusive legislation for this District, is not given to them as the Representatives of the people of this District. It is given to Congress in its collective capacity, as the legislative department of the national Government, and it is given because this District is, in the language of the Constitution, "the seat of the Government of the United States." I deny that I sit here as a Representative of the people of this District. They have no Representative; and while on that account it is eminently proper that Congress should not overlook their interests and their welfare in its legislation, the claim which is now set up by some of their self-constituted friends upon this floor to limit that legislation according to their dictation, and to pronounce that which they do in the name of the nation as immoral and unjust because it does not comport with their convictions or their prejudices, is preposterous and absurd. Congress has the same control over the District of Columbia which it has over all the Territories of the United States. It is the common property of all the people of the United States, and its laws are to be made, not by the people who for the time being inhabit it, but by the Representatives of the people of the United States, and the Senators who speak for those States. Shall we be told, sir, that if the Representatives of the people of twenty-five States are of the opinion that the laws and institutions which exist in the seat of Government of the United States ought to be changed, that they are not to be changed because a majority of the voters who reside here do not desire that change? Will any man say that the voices of these seven thousand voters are to outweigh the voices of all the constituencies of the United States in the capital of their country? I dismiss this objection, therefore, as totally destitute of reason or weight. It is based upon a fallacy so feeble that it is dissipated by the bare touch of the Constitution to it.

The question before us is free, therefore, from all political embarrassment. There is no question here of conflict of powers between the States and the General Government. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that it is the undoubted doctrine of the Constitution that the determination of the qualifications of voters rests with the several States alone and not with Congress, and that nothing but an amendment to the Constitution can alter that fundamental principle of our system. I do not say whether the States lately in rebellion can claim the benefit of that constitutional principle, nor do I say that we should refuse to apply that principle to them although they may not justly be entitled to claim it. These questions relate to another subject, are in no way concerned with the measure now before the House, and, in my opinion, are entirely foreign to the present discussion. Surely, sir, we shall best dispose of the difficult and serious work we have on hand by confining our attention to one thing at a time. By mingling subjects which are totally distinct we but confuse our minds in regard to all.

Let us inquire, therefore, whether the proposed measure is in accordance with the best interests of the people of the United States. And here let me say that whatever is the duty of the United States to do, that is for their interest to do. The two great facts written in history by the iron hand of the late war are, first, that the Union is indissoluble, and second, that human slavery is here forever abolished. From these two facts consequences corresponding in importance with the facts themselves must result: from the former a more vigorous and powerful nationality; from the latter the elevation and improvement of the race liberated by the war from bondage, as well as a higher and more advanced civilization in the region where the change has taken place. It is impossible to say that the African race occupies to-day the same position in American affairs and counts no more in weight than it did before the rebellion. You cannot strike the fetters from the limbs of four million men and leave them such as you found them. As wide as is the interval between a freeman and a slave, so wide is the difference between the African race before the rebellion and after the rebellion. You cannot keep to its ancient level a race which has been released from servitude any more than you can keep back the ocean with your hand after you have thrown down the sea-wall which restrained its impatient tides. Freedom is everywhere in history the herald of progress. It is written in the annals of all nations. It is a law of the human race. Ignorance, idleness, brutality—these belong to slavery; they are her natural offspring and allies, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANTLER,] who consumed so much time in demonstrating the comparative inferiority of the black race, answered his own argument when he reminded us that the Constitution recognized the negro only as a slave, and gave us the strongest reason why we should now begin to recognize him as a freeman. Sir, I do not doubt that the negro race is inferior to our own. That is not the question. You do not advance an inch in the argument after you have proved that premise of your case. You must show that they are not only inferior, but that they are so ignorant and degraded that they cannot be safely intrusted with the smallest conceivable part of political power and responsibility, and that this is the case, not on the plautations of Alabama and Mississippi, but here in the District of Columbia. Nay, you must not only prove that this is the general character of this population here, but that this condition is so universal and unexceptional that you cannot allow them to take this first step in freedom, although it may be hedged about with qualifications and conditions; for which of you who have opposed this measure on the ground of race has proposed to give the benefit of it to such as may be found worthy? Not one of you. And this shows that your objection is founded really on a prejudice, although it assumes the dignity and proportions of an argument. The real question, sir, is, can we afford to be just—nay, if you please, generous—to a race whose shame has been washed out in the consuming fires of war, and which now stands erect and equal before the law with our own? Shall we give hope and encouragement to that race beginning, as it does now for the first time, its career of freedom, by erecting here in the capital of the Republic a banner inscribed with the sacred legend of the elder days, "All men are born free and equal," or shall we unfurl in its stead that other banner, with a strange device, around which the dissolving remnants of the Democratic party in this Hall are called upon to rally, inscribed with no great sentiment of justice or generosity, but bearing upon its folds the miserable appeal of the demagogue, "This is a white man's Government?" When you inaugurate your newly discovered political principle, do not forget to invite the colored troops: beat the assembly; call out the remnants of the one hundred and eighty thousand men who marched with steady step through the flames and carnage of war, and many of whom bear upon their bodies the honorable scars received in that unparalleled struggle and in your defense, and as you send your banner down the line, say to them, "This is the reward of a generous country for the wounds you have received and the sufferings you have endured."

Shall we follow the great law to which I have referred—the law that liberty is progress—and conform our policy to the spirit of that great law, or shall we, governed by unreasonable and selfish prejudices, initiate a policy which will make this race our hereditary enemy, a mine beneath instead of a buttress to the edifice which you are endeavoring to repair? Sir, I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, it were better to follow where conscience and justice point, leaving results to a higher Power, than to shrink from an issue which it is the clear intention of Providence we shall face, or to be driven from our true course by the chimeras which the excited imaginations of political partisans have conjured up, or by the misty ghosts of long-buried errors, like that, for example, of Hobb vs. Fogg, which my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] startled the House by unshrouding yesterday. Surely, sir, there is no necessity to disturb the manes of such venerable personages as Hobb and Fogg. Why, sir, the Dred Scott case is old now, and as for Hobb and Fogg, they were before the flood. The war, let me tell the gentleman, has made a new slate in many things relating to law as well as politics. It has, for example, as the gentleman may perchance have heard, very much altered the status and even the definition of personal property in the southern States. No, sir, Hobb vs. Fogg is not a sufficient answer to this bill; and unless the gentleman can give us something more recent the judgment must be against him.

Mr. Speaker, the debate has assumed a somewhat discursive character, and many things have been said which it is hardly necessary to reply to. I agree to the proposition which several gentlemen have so laboriously argued, that the right to vote is not a natural right. It is not a natural right any more than the right to be President is a natural right. It is not any more natural to you than it is to the colored man. It is an artificial right, invented by society for purposes of government, an ingenious contrivance to preserve a man's liberty and his rights. To adopt the definition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANTLER,] it is "only the manner of exercising the right to be free;" only that—nothing more. It is, sir, as we know, everywhere in this country the badge of a freeman. While the class to which this bill proposes to extend it is deprived of it, that class remains virtually in the moral servitude and degradation which wore the badges of slavery. Is it necessary that that injustice should exist here under the very shadow of the Capitol? Have those who undertook to prove that the condition of this people here, morally or intellectually, was such as to render the suffrage a dangerous thing in their hands, made out their case? So far from it, sir, they have not put a single witness upon the stand, or stated a single fact in support of their assertion. On the contrary, there are certain facts which it is impossible we should overlook; such, for example, as the fact that thirty-five hundred of these men wore the uniform of the Union in the great war which has ended, and bore in that glorious struggle their share of the peril, the labor, and the suffering.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. WILSON] has also told us (I doubt not upon satisfactory authority) that the people for whom this privilege is asked own here real estate exceeding in value $1,250,000; that they own twenty-one churches valued at $125,000; that there are thirty-three schools, attended by upward of four thousand of their children; that they subscribe for four thousand five hundred copies of newspapers, and that they have among themselves over thirty literary and benevolent societies. A community characterized by such evidences of civilization and intelligence as these is not in my opinion an unsafe depository of the right of suffrage. But if you still doubt, be at least just to that large class whose education and whose qualifications in every respect enable them to conform to any reasonable conditions which you can impose. Justice—impartial, “equal, and exact justice”—is the first duty of a nation. There is no people, however weak and small, which is not strengthened and ennobled by it; there is none, however great and strong, which can with safety disregard its solemn obligations. He who answers its immortal appeal with ridicule and evasion, and he who, although his conscience is convinced, has not the courage to give his voice in favor of the right, are alike unequal to the duties and unworthy of the responsibilities of the present hour.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, my colleague says that I have established no foundation for the case I have cited of Hobb against Fogg. I have shown that it was the supreme law of the land; that it was the supreme law of the State of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not deny that fact. If he says that it has no weight I have only to leave him in that position. So long as it is constitutional law judicially decided I claim for it the consideration of this House.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman had taken the trouble to listen to my argument he would not have made this interruption. The House, or that portion which listened to my argument, will remember perfectly well the point I made when I referred to my colleague from the first district. I did not deny that there was the decision he referred to of Hobb against Fogg. I did not deny that it was made thirty years ago, and that it was the law of Pennsylvania, having been made by the highest judicial tribunal of that State. I do not controvert the correctness of the gentleman's citation. What I said was, that we had not been asleep during the last thirty years. Why, Mr. Speaker, are we to learn nothing from the great trials and revolutions through which we have passed? When the institution which lay at the bottom of this discrimination has been broken into pieces, ground into powder, after four years of war, which was begun for its maintenance; when no fragment of it is left in the southern States, are we to be told that a “tuppenny” case, cited by the gentleman here from a report made thirty years ago in the State of Pennsylvania, is to answer an argument founded upon the interests of justice and the duty of the country?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I only asserted that that was the law. The argument of the gentleman cast a reflection upon the judgment of the court in that case. Now, I go further, and say that, in obedience to the law set forth in that case, and in obedience to the will of the people of that State, the convention called to amend the constitution of that State inserted the word “white” so that the judgment of the court could be carried out without equivocation or evasion.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman tell me, if he pleases, what that has to do with the argument?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did not interrupt my colleague, but I only rose to ask whether he did not admit that was the law as settled by the highest judicial authority of Pennsylvania. Having had a response, my object in rising has been accomplished.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman has not listened to my argument. I did not deny that it was the law of Pennsylvania. What I said was that it had nothing to do with the subject before the House, that it had no bearing upon the subject, and was therefore no answer to the argument that justice and the best interests of the country required the right of suffrage to be given to that class in this District, although it was decided in the case of Hobb against Fogg that a negro should not vote.

Mr. WINFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to assert that the antiquity of that decision deprives it of sanctity?

Mr. THAYER. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure. It is altogether practically useless, because this decision was made while the constitutional convention was in session.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir, before.

Mr. THAYER. I believe it was a case got up for the purpose of having effect on the convention.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me one word? I had the misfortune to be a member of that convention. [Laughter.] It was called mainly to change the tenure of the judges, to make it elective instead of appointive. The question in regard to negro suffrage was also known to be coming up, and it was thought that that would help to bring about the calling of a convention. The judges of the supreme court did not want a convention because they were satisfied with life tenure; and just before the election took place upon the question of calling the convention, the judges got up this case outside, and thought in that way to prevent the calling of a convention. I know all about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. As my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] was a member of the convention, he is the best possible authority for anything that relates to this particular matter so far as it has any bearing upon that convention. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is answered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS] who was a member of the convention may by his sarcasm think he has disposed of this matter, and of the supreme court judges with it; but he cannot rub out the law written in the statute-book.

Mr. THAYER. It must be obvious to everybody that the case to which the gentleman refers, and which seems to constitute all the artillery that the gentleman has in his arsenal, is of no consequence whatever, because the convention of Pennsylvania which sat immediately after the decision did put the word “white” into the constitution. Thus that case, upon which the gentleman places so much emphasis, becomes of no possible consequence.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The decision of the court was the law of the State, because it was a construction of the constitution of 1790 as to the meaning of the word “freeman.”

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman tell me what that has to do with the argument?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am going on to answer. If the gentleman had listened to my argument yesterday, he would have understood that. I cited that case in answer to certain statements in regard to the history of Pennsylvania, made by my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] which not only made my allusion to the case in point proper, but overwhelming against my colleague, who stood there almost dumb, unable to answer. And the gentleman to-day is unable to answer.

Mr. THAYER. Which colleague does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from the fourth district [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. It was I that was struck dumb! [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. I do not know that I have anything to do with that.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a moment?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to mention an historical fact in connection with that convention. It will, I am sure, provoke no reply from anybody. The constitution of 1838 should have been signed by all the members of that convention. It lacks one signature. There was one honest, earnest friend of humanity in that convention who refused to put his name to it because of the retrograde movement it made in reference to the question of suffrage. He declined doing so until the word “white” should be stricken out. I hope to live to see the day when that name shall be put there. It is the name of THADDEUS STEVENS. [Applause.]

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. The passage, Mr. Speaker, of some law by this Congress amending the election system of this District, placing all upon an equality, and wiping out all distinctions as to caste or color; is, in my judgment, both proper and necessary, and demanded by the loyal people of the country, who have a right to be heard in the solution of all matters or questions that may arise in the government of the District.

The bill as it now stands is not one of my choice, from the fact that I prefer to treat this question of colored suffrage in this District as a new question, and get all the benefits that a fair and reasonable trial of it may produce, regulated and qualified by such restrictions as sound judgment and a well-guarded policy may dictate. I do not say that I will not support the bill as it stands, for I am in favor of some positive action in this direction, and if called upon to vote for this bill as an alternative I may do so; but still, I think greater and better results will flow from a measure embodying, in part at least, the propositions of my colleague, [Mr. HALE,] which, while it secures equal rights to all, or places all upon the same level as to privileges and restrictions, answers the great end to be secured and all that justice now demands. I am in favor of impartial suffrage here; impartial as to caste or color, and giving all the same incentives to adopt and carry out a course of rectitude, industry, and enterprise which shall result in a condition of thrift and intelligence that will make them worthy of the privileges and blessings conferred.

I cannot conceive how any one can be injured by such a policy and such a result. Prejudices of long standing may be encountered, it is true; but it is time they were overcome and demolished, and no longer allowed to rule the individual or the community upon questions of such vast importance, where sacred rights are at stake, and their protection and safety depend upon a candid and honest judgment in the case.

In the discussion of the principles of this bill almost every one has been betrayed into a general debate upon the rights of the colored race as it has existed in our country from the time of its first introduction, as well as those rights which it is conceded generally the war for the Union has extended to it. I will not take the time of the House on this occasion and under this measure to enter into such a discussion to any great length, but merely to refer to some of the positions taken by some gentlemen upon the other side, leaving the discussion of general questions for a future occasion when more properly in order.

They seem to have forgotten, in their advocacy of slavery, that we have passed through a fierce war, begun by slavery, waged against the Government by slavery, and solely in its interest, to more thoroughly establish itself upon the western continent, and crush out the best interests of freedom and humanity; and that this war, guided on our part by the omnipotent arm of the Invisible, made bare in our behalf, has resulted in a most complete overthrow of this great wrong; and by the almost omnipotent voice of the Republic, as now expressed in its fundamental law, it has no right to live, much less entitled to the right of burial, and should have no mourners in the land or going about the streets. Such speeches as those of the gentlemen from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] and from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] and my colleague and friend, [Mr. CHANLER,] who represents, with myself, in part, the Empire State, carry us back to the days and scenes before the war, when slavery ruled supreme, not only throughout the land, by and through its hold upon power, which the people, in an evil hour, had given it, but here in these Halls of legislation, where liberty and its high and noble ends ought to have been secured by just and equal laws and the great and paramount object of our system of government carried out and fully developed. They seem to forget that liberty and good government have been on trial during these five years' last past of war and blood, and that they have succeeded in the mighty struggle. They forget that Providence, in a thousand ways, during this fierce conflict, has given us evidence of His favor, and led us out of the land of bondage into a purer and a higher state of freedom, where slavery, as an institution among us, is no more. Why do they labor so long and so ardently to resurrect again into life this foul and loathsome thing? Why cannot they forget their former love and attachments in this direction, and no longer cling with such undying grasp to this dead carcass, which by its corruptions and rottenness has well nigh heretofore poisoned them to the death? Why not awake to the new order of things, and accept the results which God has worked out in our recent struggle, and not raise the weak arm of flesh to render null and void what has thus been done, and thus attempt to turn back the flow of life which is overspreading all and penetrating every part of the body-politic with its noble purposes and exalted hopes?

Mr. CHANLER. I ask my colleague to allow me a word.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I decline to yield.

Mr. CHANLER. It is in regard to that very question; it is but to ask a question.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I decline.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I deny every word he utters and demand a full and explicit statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] has declined, and he must proceed without interruption.

Mr. CHANLER. I again ask the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I prefer not to at present. The gentleman's speech in the Globe speaks for him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must reply positively whether he yields or not.

Mr. CHANLER. I protest against misrepresentation of myself by the gentleman. The gentleman has no right to continue his course of argument after it has been specifically denied unless he—

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. When my colleague declines to yield it is not in order for his colleague, by force of lungs, to attempt to inject anything into the gentleman's speech that he does not want there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN HORN] whether he yielded the floor, but could not get a positive reply. Gentlemen must state positively whether they allow interruptions, and if the gentleman from New York now says he declines to yield, the Chair will protect him.

Mr. VAN HORN of New York. I do. I have no desire to misrepresent my colleague. The whole tenor of his speech accords with all I have said of it, as the Globe will show.

These gentlemen are fearful that the action proposed for this District will savor too much of negro equality. They see terrible results which they are sure must flow from this legislation, and they are filled with apprehensions as to the future of this community, and any other where civil rights are extended to the colored population. They assume to be the special guardians of the public welfare, and admit no doubt as to the results which they have declared must certainly follow the action proposed. Such was always the cry when slavery ruled the hour from those who, here and elsewhere, have always been its champions, and who, fired by an unholy purpose to make it so permanent that neither the people in their sovereign power, nor the Almighty by His omnipotence, could shake or overthrow it, to secure more certainly their object, struck at the very life of the Republic; and in the struggle slavery and they fell as shattered and blasted wrecks, and lie as a warning to the present and the future not to crush the sacred and inalienable rights of humanity.

What can these gentlemen gain by entering themselves so conspicuously as the apologists of this great crime of slavery and the traitors and treason that have fallen in its defense and to perpetuate it in our land? If such an effort were ever respectable, it is no longer so. Judgment has been pronounced against it and all its defenders, past, present, and future, by the wonderful and decisive results of the deadly strife through which we have passed; and to stand up, especially in this Hall, in this high place of the nation, before the whole people and the world, all of whom unite in the solemn verdict rendered, and defend this horrid crime of the past, and its old supporters as a consequence, presents a more reckless defiance of the ways of the Almighty than I supposed humanity could gather to itself. This question of negro equality will regulate itself. Our society is so organized and our education is such that I have no fears of the results socially of which gentlemen speak. The two races will naturally and inevitably be distinct and separate in many respects, while habit, race, and character will keep them socially, as they ever have been, separate and divided. At least it is not wise nor just to refuse to do what every noble and just consideration requires us to do, for fear that some imaginary evil may result from such performance of duty. It is rather wisdom and justice to boldly meet such questions by faithful performance of duty, and provide against actual evil when it does arise. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] after counting the cost of the recent war for the Union, and drawing a vivid picture of the desolation and anguish which it has spread all over the face of the nation, and declaring that the fathers and relatives of those who thus suffer are the men who suppressed the rebellion, says:

"Shall the brave soldiers of our Army be now, by any kind of extreme and radical legislation, put upon an equality with the very men whom they fought to free?"

Sir, I would give them no rights to which they are not justly entitled. I would let them occupy that position socially, mentally, and morally, which, by a fair share of public favor and a proper and just distribution of privileges and civil rights, they can attain to, and hold, by their industry, intelligence, and purity of character.

The gentleman himself is more distressed over a contact with these colored men than are the soldiers of the Republic. No soldier who has fought the battles of his country side by side with the black man, or had a part in the same terrible struggle which has resulted in the salvation of the nation's life, will shudder over the idea of his being elevated in the scale of being by every possible and just means, and having placed before him every and all incentives to a higher and a nobler life. For such grand results the war was waged in part, and although we did not know at all times what problems were being solved by the fierce conflict, still the result has been to us a wonderful revelation. While it has been a struggle between liberty and slavery, it has also been one between the low, the poor, the honest man of toil upon the one hand, and the aristocrat on the other, who, priding himself on his superiority and power, oftentimes usurped, claimed the benefits of the poor man's toil without remuneration, and who executed his will by force, and by laws he himself had made. The soldier who has aided in crushing out this wicked oppression upon the rights of honest labor, under whatever skin it may be found, and thus established forever in this land by his sufferings those sacred rights, will stand as ever before by the side of every citizen of the Republic, of whatever color, in defense of the rights for which he has fought.

Again, the gentleman says this is a white man's Government; that it was intended, as all Governments have been, especially and exclusively for the benefit of white men and white women, and not for those who belong to the negro, mulatto, or Indian race. Our Government is one for all who come under its protection, or of whom it asks obedience and support. The black as well as the white pay taxes to support it, and aid in the defense of its honor and the execution of its laws. Although, as formerly administered, it has been the white man's Government in some respects, and used to crush out the rights of the black man, the great struggle now closed has settled the question that the black man has "rights that the white man is bound to respect." Just those rights and no more are we bound to defend and protect against oppression and assault from all sources, and see that they are properly guaranteed and preserved, which justly belong to him and the altered condition of things demands shall be guaranteed to him.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] says "the negro has no history of civilization. From the earliest ages of recorded time he has ever been a savage or a slave." He argues with a good deal of learning and skill to show the inferiority of the black race in every essential particular, and makes it more degraded, if possible, than the oppression of ages has made it in fact; but neglects to admit, what is apparent to all and cannot be denied, that the low condition of ignorance, degradation, and, I may say, of inferiority, which it exhibits, has been produced, in the main at least, by the very crushing-out process practiced so long upon it by the white race, which boasts of its superiority while it has its foot upon the neck of its subjugated fellow. Ages of crime, of oppression, and despotism have passed, and we often wonder at the slow progress of revolution and change in working out and developing the sublime destiny of the human race, and fixing beyond a doubt and irrevocably the sacred and inalienable rights of humanity; but, in the apparently slow progress of events, great changes have nevertheless been wrought out from time to time, and now and then there has been wrested from the tyrant's grasp a guarantee of privilege and right. So in the struggle which has just closed in our country. During the first years of the conflict the colored race within the power of the rebellion, whom gentlemen declare had not energy and manhood enough to impel them forward to strike for liberty themselves, were repelled from us by every demonstration of power and physical force, and driven back to our enemies. We only became powerful, and I may say successful, when we became just toward those people; and as soon as we were just, and lifted the heavy hand of power from their crushed forms and still more crushed spirits, they arose as one man to the rescue, first of the Government which had always denied them their liberty, and second, to assert, in the fiery shock of battle, their manhood and their claims to freedom and its immunities.

The result of this struggle is another demonstration of the fact that the "world moves," and, as one after another the iron bands of despotism are broken, and the bound and fettered are let loose into a broader sphere of activity, to work their way upward to a higher and nobler destiny, that ere long the record will not stand as now declared by these gentlemen, but in every particular accord with the advanced spirit of the age, civilization and impartial liberty.

We should be the last people to plead the legitimate results of our own crimes against the colored race in our own country as a justification of our prejudices and our acts toward them, while we should be the first to note the indications of Providence in their behalf, and at least allow them to be put on trial and see if they can sustain their claim to our consideration and favor.

My friend and colleague [Mr. CHANLER] devotes his hour to showing that there are no elements of character in the colored race that will justify us in giving it civil rights and privileges as proposed. I am sorry that so many good qualities as my friend possesses should be dimmed in part, at least, by his determined opposition to the inevitable and logical results of the great struggle of the nineteenth century which has just closed, and whose deadly shocks of battle have made the world to tremble, while thrones, despotisms, and tyrants everywhere, have felt the earthquake and been shaken to their very foundations. Why cannot he see as well as others that the old ways are closed, and that a new way has been opened to our people to walk in, where justice and truth should go hand in hand—a highway broad and equal, with no obstructions to impede their progress save those that God has ordained and placed upon them, and in it, according to His own immutable purpose and sovereign will?

Thus far these people have shown much obedience to law and order, and demeaned themselves as properly as could be expected; and in the field, under our flag, have exhibited rare traits of character, and given the most conclusive evidence that while they desire liberty and good government, they are ready to do and to die to secure the one and permanently establish the other. The facts of past history are in many instances against the reasoning of these gentlemen, while the present stands out a complete refutation of their whole argument and policy.

No class of people, asking for a recognition of what they deem to be their rights, having shown themselves worthy by the greatest sacrifices, loyalty, and patience, should be denied a fair chance to vindicate themselves before the world and determine the question, as in the case before us, by a practical solution of it. The President, in his message to this House and the country, speaking of the general subject of the treatment of the freedmen, presents the idea I have suggested truthfully and properly when he says:

"We must equally avoid hasty assumptions of any natural impossibility for the two races to live side by side in a state of mutual benefit and good will. The experiment involves us in no inconsistency; let us, then, go on and make that experiment in good faith, and not be too easily disheartened."

"If they fail and so perish away, let us be careful that the failure shall not be attributable to any denial of justice."

These words were made with reference to the question of labor as connected with the freedman and his rights to the proceeds of his labor, which he insists must be protected and guaranteed, but have application alike to giving him a fair trial to show himself a man and worthy of the privileges it is proposed to confer upon him. When will there be a better opportunity than the present to try the experiment of impartial suffrage, and where the place so appropriate as this District? Here we have supreme control, no constitutional difficulties in the way, and should the experiment prove a failure, as I do not believe, but as time will determine, we have the remedy in our own hands and at our control to correct all the evils that may result from it, and can apply it without delay.

Sir, a measure of this kind is just, because it will give to a large class of persons, intelligent, upright citizens of this District, enterprising, energetic business men, who hold property and pay taxes, obey and aid in the execution of the laws, the right to be heard in the making of such laws, and a voice in the selection of those who are to execute them and dispense justice in the District. It is expedient for the reason that as loyal citizens, by their devotion to our common country, they have established the fact beyond controversy that they know how to, and will, appreciate civil rights and privileges when conferred, and demean themselves properly and with decent regard for the public interests.

I learn that a large portion of all the taxes paid into the national Treasury in this District is paid by colored property-holders and business men; some of whom pay taxes on sums as high as $25,000; whose enterprise and business thrift go very far toward giving this District its present advanced condition of prosperity, and whose high moral character, as a class, does not suffer by comparison with any other, when we take into account the favor with which it has been treated by those who have been superior to them in point of privilege.

MR. KELLEY. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I will state that one of the colored people of this District pays taxes on $200,000 worth of property accumulated by himself; and that when we abolished slavery in the District one of them, a laboring man, held a mortgage against the estate of Senator Douglas for $12,000, and a mortgage against the adjoining house also, the property of Senator Rice, for $6,000.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I was not aware of the fact. I give the information I have received, and gladly accept the statement of my friend from Pennsylvania.

This large property interest has a right to be heard in the administration of affairs in this District, to protect itself against injustice, and secure for itself a proper direction and share of the public charities and public expenditures. It is a remarkable fact, which I hope does not now exist, that up to quite a recent period this unfortunate class of people were prohibited from forming and sustaining schools by their own efforts, and at their own expense, for the education of their children. And this here, where it is admitted Congress has supreme control, and is charged with the duty of seeing justice and equality take place. While I hope and believe that such is not the fact now, to the same extent at least as formerly, if at all, I am not quite willing to leave these people entirely powerless to protect themselves against wrong and injustice, especially when I have the best reason to know that any rights they may have extended to them by law will be properly appreciated, and by no means abused.

What record do these colored people in the District present to the country? According to the census of 1860 the colored population was a little less than fifteen thousand. It has been somewhat increased of late, as one of the consequences of the war, but the statistics which I here submit present a state and condition of things produced by the enterprise, intelligence, and thrift of the population above referred to, and before the war:

"The value of real and personal property now owned by them is over one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

"The value of church property held by them is about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, consisting of twenty-three churches, which are supported at a cost of over twenty thousand dollars per annum. The number of church communicants is four thousand three hundred, while the average attendance upon religious services is nine thousand, some of these being attendants upon service at Catholic and Episcopal churches controlled by whites. The number of Sabbath schools for colored persons is twenty-three, attended by between three and four thousand pupils."

"Of other schools for colored children there are thirty-three, and the number of pupils attending them during the month of November, 1865, was four thousand and thirty. Six of these schools are entirely supported by the colored people, others are supported by the generosity of northern benevolent societies, though the necessary books, stationery, &c., are furnished chiefly by the colored people themselves."

"Four thousand of the colored population of the District can read and write. They subscribe for about forty-five hundred copies of newspapers, a large proportion of these being dailies."

"Of societies for literary, benevolent, and other purposes, they have over thirty, and through the agency of these they, to a very great extent, provide for and support the needy and infirm of their race in the District, the city government having but a very small per cent. of colored paupers to support."

"This is the record of a class of citizens in this community, ninety per cent. of which were slaves or the immediate descendants of slaves, many having purchased their own freedom and that of their families."

And what record, sir, have they made during the war, and since they were allowed to reënforce our armies, and share in the trials and honors of the "great conflict?"

The colored population of this District, as a class, have shown as much devotion to our country during the severe struggle through which it has passed as their white neighbors. They have exhibited, to say the least, as high order of loyalty, and as much of it, as the white population. They were always true, always the friends of the Government, in sunshine or in storm, in victory or defeat. While many with a whiter skin were plotting treason and conspiring to overthrow the Government which had made them all they were, and given them their daily bread, no treason or conspiracy was ever found in their ranks, or stained their hands with the innocent blood of the loyal and faithful defenders of the Republic.

Out of a population to which I have referred, they contributed three full regiments, over three thousand five hundred enlisted men, while the white population of upward of sixty thousand sent only about fifteen hundred men for the support of the Union, the Constitution, and the laws. In all our country's trials their loyalty has never been questioned, and their patriotism has been unbounded. They volunteered with alacrity without the incentives of high pay, bounties, or promotions, led by white officers, with no expectation of any advancement in the ranks for gallantry or heroic conduct. They were willing to trust themselves and theirs in the hands of the loyal people of the country, for the honor of which they fought, and many of them died, and whose free institutions they desire to see perpetuated to the latest generations.

In their memorial to this House they say:

"We cherish fond hopes and laudable desires and honorable aspirations in connection with the future of our country."

Who shall say that this record is not a good one? How dare we turn our backs upon these people in view of these facts, when we must know, too, that through all the way we have passed the hand of the Invisible has led us on to this glad hour of triumph, that we may do justice, and for the future work the works of righteousness that we may be exalted indeed? But it is said that the people of the District are opposed to the principle of impartial suffrage, and voted against it by a large majority. So were they opposed to the Government in the dark days of the early part of the recent war, and if they had voted then would no doubt have voted down the Government by a large majority. What though the voters of this District express an opinion adverse to this proposition at the polls? They are a party in interest, influenced by strong and most degrading prejudices against the colored population, and will act under the influence of such prejudices oftentimes, irrespective of the justice in the case.

Shall the Government fail to do justice to its loyal subjects, because of the opposition of those who are governed by strong prejudices, and others who have persisted in their efforts to destroy the Government until failure is certain, and now seek to control and regulate its policy? Again, had it been left to the people of the District in 1861 to abolish slavery by their votes, it would have been to-day, as formerly, the disgrace of the nation; and instead of beholding the national capital, the great heart of the Republic so to speak, throbbing with the healthy flow of a purer and a higher life, slavery would still be festering at its very core, consuming all its vitality and hope.

What harm, sir, has resulted from such abolition in this District? Who would go back to the old state of things, of servitude and wrong in the national capital? Not one; and so will it be if impartial, well-regulated suffrage become a law, when the people have a complete demonstration of the spirit and devotion to law and order on the part of this class of our citizens.

Tell me that a majority of the people here are against this proposition! Let it be remembered that the aggregate of the majorities of all the Union members of this House is the majority in favor of the principle of justice here proposed, and the verdict rendered by the people, who have a right to be heard in the solution of this question. They have long since declared that this District shall be free; that no slave shall tread upon its soil, or within it carry his chains; that the last stain made by the curse of human bondage shall be wiped out, and this District elevated to a higher and a nobler life of freedom, justice, and equal protection before the law. There can come no possible injury to any one, as I can conceive, should impartial suffrage be established here by law, regulated by wholesome and wise provisions. It will be no precedent for future action upon equal suffrage anywhere else, for here we are agreed upon the question of right to legislate in this regard; while there is a propriety, to say the least, in placing this District above any of the degrading conditions of partial or unequal legislation. Let us act upon the suggestions of the President, that it is wise to try these people, and not prejudice their case before a fair trial is made, so that if in the end they fail to be worthy of the privileges conferred, it cannot be said that it was "from any denial of justice on our part."

And here, sir, permit me to say in conclusion, that while I do not pretend to speak for the President upon this or any other question, I have the greatest confidence in his patriotism and fidelity, and believe he is actuated by the purest and highest motives to do the best for his country. Gentlemen upon the other side are continually endeavoring by every means in their power to convince the country that the majority of this House are opposed to the President and his policy. It is time to make out such a case when the facts exist to warrant it, for they do not now. New questions are continually arising upon which the President and each member of this House has a right to, and should, act independently and for the greatest good to the greatest number after a careful and conscientious examination of the whole case; and it would be strange, indeed, if even here there could be harmonious action always upon all these important and new questions.

Upon details we may differ. It cannot be expected that upon all questions that will arise or that force themselves upon us—new questions that never before have been presented—we can come to the same conclusion as to all effects and bearings in the future, yet the great purpose of the majority of this House is to secure the greatest good to our common country, and stand together with the President to heal, restore, elevate, and ennoble by doing justice to all. He knows what the Union has cost and by what people it has been saved. He knows the temper and spirit of those who sacrificed in its behalf, around whose hearthstones there is deep lamentation and mourning because loved ones are gone and do not return. He knows who, when the skies were covered with thick darkness, and the cloud of battle and defeat gloomed about us, stood steadfast and made him strong in his purpose and hope of final triumph. And he knows they are still able to sustain and carry him through his present hour of trial, while he continues to aid in solving the great problem before us, and securing union, liberty, and justice, the legitimate results of the great conflict, for all coming time. His patriotism has been tried as by fire. His devotion to country needs no mention from me, for it is one of the most sublime features of the recent struggle for the nation's life, and will fill a bright page in its history. With moderation, generosity, and due consideration of the great questions to be solved; with an earnest purpose to stand together in the right, as it shall be given us to see the right, we shall, step by step, advance toward the grand consummation of all our loyal hopes, and our starry banner wave over a united people filling our broad land from shore to shore.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. As the hour is late and I do not desire to go on now, I am willing that the House shall adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee notified the House that he would bring this question to a vote at half past three o'clock to-morrow, and there are a number of gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. CONKLING. I think we had better go on. It wants a quarter to four o'clock.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Well, if any gentleman desires to speak to-night, I will yield to him with the understanding that I am to have the floor to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAND GRANT TO IOWA.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported a bill to amend an act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, approved May 12, 1864; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE C. JOHNSON.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of George C. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CHARLES F. ANDERSON.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles F. Anderson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LAND GRANT TO WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to the State of West Virginia, to aid in the construction of railroads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD IN MARYLAND.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of the office of the United States Coast Survey furnish to this House a statement of the advantages, if any, that the Patuxent river, in the State of Maryland, possesses for the establishment of a national navy-yard, stating the depth of water in which a proper harbor can be reached in said river, giving a description of such harbor, its size and soundings, whether or not obstructed by ice in the winter, its facilities for defense in time of war, its distance from the city of Washington, the nature of the land adjacent thereto, and such other facts in connection therewith as may be known to such Superintendent.

MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the benefit of certain volunteer troops of Missouri who served during the war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOUNTIES.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House (No. 116) granting bounty and additional bounty to soldiers, seamen, and marines, in the war of 1861, or their heirs, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM M'CLURE.

Mr. PERHAM also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of William McClure, of Jefferson county, West Virginia; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE FRENCH EXPOSITION.

Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York in regard to the French Exposition, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope my colleague will assure the House that the reference of these resolutions to a committee will not commit the House or operate as an instruction to the committee. I have been afraid, ever since yesterday morning, that presenting resolutions for reference does commit somebody.

Mr. RAYMOND. I assure my colleague that there is not in these resolutions any phrase which can possibly beget the suspicion, as his did, that they can be so construed.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very much obliged for the assurance. I was afraid that the reference of the resolutions might commit us in some way.

Mr. RAYMOND's motion was then agreed to.

A. M. JESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to A. M. Jess, of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. KUYKENDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill amendatory of the general acts regarding pensions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a privileged motion. As there are several members who desire to be heard on the bill which has been under discussion to-day, and some of them probably will not have a chance to do so should the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. Wilson, of Iowa] call for a vote at half past three o'clock to-morrow, I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, for the discussion of that bill only.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it would be better to take a recess until to-morrow at noon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind gentlemen that a few moments ago when he made the inquiry whether any one desired to speak this afternoon no one appeared ready to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. As the best way to decide the matter, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH. I will withdraw my motion for a recess.

Mr. STEVENS. As that decides the matter, I will withdraw my motion to adjourn.

JAMES E. HORSMAN.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of James E. Horsman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SOLDIERS' ASYLUM IN MISSOURI.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of Congress making an appropriation for the State of Missouri, for the purpose of purchasing a suitable site and buildings, to be used as an asylum for the loyal soldiers of Missouri, volunteers and militia, disabled in the service of the United States, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

CENSUS REPORT—MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to have compiled in tabular form a statement showing the aggregate amount of manufactures, of all kinds, in each city and village in the United States having a population of ten thousand persons and upward, as shown by the census of 1860; the statement to exhibit the capital and the number of persons employed in said manufactures, as well as the value of the products thereof, and the number of persons residing in said cities and villages respectively, and to transmit the same to this House.

RAILROAD IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back House bill No. 138, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon; and moved that the same be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIP ART UNION.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to change the name of the ship Art Union to the name of George M. Barnard, and asked the immediate action of the House thereon.

Mr. ELIOT. I object. I cannot consent to have this joint resolution passed without its being first considered by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. This is not a commercial ship, but a State ship, attached to the State reform school.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I withdraw my objection.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

NAVIGATION OF THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire what further legislation, if any, is necessary to improve the navigation of the Ohio river, between its mouth and the city of Cincinnati, and especially at the falls of said river, near the city of Louisville, Kentucky, with leave to report by bill or otherwise at the earliest practicable period.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolutions, and that they be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved, That the United States Government grants the power peaceably, or if necessary by arms, "to enforce the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;" but the General Government cannot by any action whatever destroy itself nor the State governments; nor can the State governments destroy either, or legally disturb the harmony of the whole. All the grants and powers under the Constitution are conservative, none destructive; wherefore all the States have been and are always in the Union.

Resolved, That when the United States Government suppressed the insurrection it only vindicated its constitutional power and preëxisting rights, and no more; and the rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments are all remitted back and assume the same condition and relations sustained before the insurrection, and (except so far as altered or amended) remain unimpaired and in full force and virtue.

Resolved, That the law of Congress apportioning Representatives to the several States (including the insurrectionary States) under the census of 1860 is constitutional and valid, and that members of Congress from all the States, regularly elected under said law, are entitled forthwith to their seats upon taking the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That as a generous kindness and cordial forgiveness consistent with right, now peace exists, are the highest attributes of our nature, and as we must have "one Government, one Constitution, and one people," the glory, protection, and safety of all—cherishing these feelings, we say it is untimely, unjust, and impolitic to insist upon amendments to the Constitution to operate upon all until all are represented in the House and Senate.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. CONKLING. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] if he objects to the resolutions or to their reference.

Mr. BROOMALL. To both.

Mr. CONKLING. As I understand they are introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRIDER] merely for the purpose of reference, I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BROOMALL. I must insist on my objection.

Mr. GRIDER. I beg leave to inquire of the Chair what is the condition of my resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made to their introduction, they have not been received, but will be returned to the gentleman. He can introduce them when his State is called for resolutions.

ABELARD GUTHRIE.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Abelard Guthrie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CAPTAIN CHARLES BREWSTER.

Mr. WINFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to relieve Captain Charles Brewster from accounting for Government funds stolen from him while in the service of the Government; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to secure the early and speedy construction of a ship-canal between the Illinois river and Lake Michigan, and that they report to this House at an early day, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LE BLOND moved (at four o'clock p. m.) that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

TAX ON RAILROAD FARES AND FREIGHTS.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so graduating taxation for revenue upon fares and rates charged by railroad companies and others for the transportation of passengers and freight over the highways of commerce, that while necessary revenues shall be derived, relief may incidentally result to the agricultural and other interests of the country from the high and oppressive impositions that are now crushing those interests, and especially in the West; and whether, by judicious and lawful exercise of the powers of Congress to raise revenue and to regulate the trade and commerce between the States, prompt relief may not be afforded to the farmers and consumers of the country from the exorbitant exactions of combined monopolies.

TAX ON SALES OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the internal revenue law so that but one tax shall be imposed upon the sale of farm products by dealers, whether such sale be made by dealers themselves or through the agency of commission merchants.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and ten minutes) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. VINCENT PALEN, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, praying for compensation for depredations committed by white persons upon his property in Kansas Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Francis Miller, of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying for the payment of money which he alleges to be due him for supplies which he furnished the navy-yards at Charlestown, Massachusetts, Brooklyn, New York, and Gosport, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the Paris Exposition to take place in 1867, urging Congress to make timely and adequate preparations for exhibiting the products of the American Union in such a manner and on such a scale as shall maintain its just rank among the civilized nations of the earth; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NESMITH presented the petition of Goldsmith Brothers, praying to be indemnified for United States bonds lost on board the steamer Brother Jonathan on the 31st of July, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of S. H. Peugh, agent and attorney for the administrator in the case of Francis Cazeau, deceased, praying that the papers in that case may be withdrawn from the Court of Claims and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of officers in the United States revenue cutter service, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of George Warren, Daniel Hood, and C. R. Humphrey, praying compensation for the ship State of Maine, owned by them, which was seized by the rebel authorities on the 24th of May, 1861, and burnt by them on the arrival of the United States troops and fleet at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Dr. L. Dyer, late surgeon in the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers, praying for compensation for services rendered as surgeon from the 6th of April, 1863, to the 26th of May, 1863, the time between the dates of his dismissal and restoration; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented a petition of soldiers who enlisted in the years 1861 and 1862, praying for an equalization of their bounties with the bounties of those who enlisted at a later period during the recent war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Tylersport, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a post road from Tylersport, Montgomery county, to Seller's Tavern, Bucks county, in that State; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Sophia Schemmelfennig, widow of the late General Alexander Schemmelfennig, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Racine, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of C. F. Johnson, of Mobile, Alabama, praying for compensation for damages sustained by him from the United States forces at Lakeport, near New Orleans, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NYE. I present the petition of Major S. H. Lathrop, United States Army, and other officers now stationed at the city of New York, praying for an increase of their pay and for the repeal of the law reducing the mileage from ten to six cents a mile. They set forth the fact that since they were commissioned the pay of the soldiers and sailors of the Navy has been increased from sixty to one hundred per cent., and they desire that their pay shall be increased pro rata. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Fitzgibbon, praying for a pension, reported a bill (S. No. 82) granting a pension to Sarah Fitzgibbon; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 26) granting to "the International Ocean Telegraph Company" the right and privilege to establish telegraphic communication between the city of New York and the West India islands, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a petition of the officers of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad, praying for an extension of the time for the completion of that road, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, and the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad Company, and various other railroad companies, asking for an extension of the time within which to complete their several roads, have had the subject under consideration and directed me to report a bill granting, substantially, the prayer of the petition. As the bill consists of only one section, and simply extends the time eight years, and I am advised that the companies desire immediate action on the subject, so that they may know whether the time is to be extended or not, I ask for the present consideration of the bill if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 83) to extend the time for completing certain land-grant railroads in the States therein named, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the time allowed for the completion of the several roads named in the acts approved on the 15th and 17th of May, the 3d of June, and 11th of August, 1856, granting lands to aid in the construction of railroads therein to the States of Iowa, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi, which time will expire by law in the year 1866, eight years from the dates fixed by those acts respectively; but the unsold lands are to revert to the United States as provided in those acts if the railroads are not completed within the period thus fixed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has that bill been reported upon by the Committee on Public Lands? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been reported this morning from that committee.

Mr. MORRILL. It is pretty difficult to understand much about the bill from simply hearing it read at the desk. I will ask if there is any particular necessity for its being pressed at the present time.

Mr. POMEROY. I was requested by the committee to ask that it be put on its passage, as the parties who are interested in building those roads desire to know as soon as possible whether the time is to be extended or not. Their time expires this year, 1866. The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] within whose State some of these roads are, is better acquainted with the facts than I am.

Mr. GRIMES. In 1856, Congress granted to the State of Iowa certain lands to aid in the construction of four railroads across the State, and required the State to complete those roads within ten years from that date. During the same year Congress granted to the States of Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, certain lands for the purpose of enabling those States to complete railroads. No one of those railroads is completed, although the companies to whom the States transferred the lands have used due diligence, in the estimation of the committee, in order to complete them. In consequence of the war, the increase in the value of labor, and the increase in the value of iron and other materials necessary to be used in the construction of the railroads, they have not been able to comply with the terms of the grant that was made to them. All that these companies have asked, and all that the Committee on Public Lands propose to grant to them, is that they shall be allowed to go on and complete the roads within the next eight years, giving them that additional length of time.

Mr. HENDERICKS. I suggest to the Senator also that this is the same legislation which was passed at the last session for the benefit of the roads in Michigan.

Mr. GRIMES. I was going to say that Congress had granted a similar extension of time to other States, at the last session, under precisely similar circumstances. This bill does not put the Government in any different position from what it was before, except that it simply extends the time within which these various roads are to be completed.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to interpose an objection if the subject has received the careful consideration of the committee, which it seems to have done.

Mr. GRIMES. The bill does not grant a foot of land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MADISON'S WRITINGS.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on the Library have directed me to report a joint resolution for the distribution of the writings of James Madison. I suppose there is no objection to considering the joint resolution at the present time. I ask for its consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, which proposes to direct the Joint Committee on the Library to distribute by mail or otherwise the five hundred copies of the writings of James Madison, published by authority of Congress, as follows: to the President of the United States, one copy; to the libraries of the different Executive Departments and of the Postmaster General and Attorney General, one copy each; to each member of the present Senate and House of Representatives, one copy; to the Library of Congress, ten copies; to the libraries of the several States and Territories of the Union, one copy each; to such public and college libraries as may be designated by the present Joint Committee on the Library, one hundred copies; the residue to be retained in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SUMNER. I suppose that by "libraries of the several States and Territories of the Union" is meant the public libraries in those States.

Mr. HOWE. The State libraries.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison was, by unanimous consent, read three times, and passed.

OFFICIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. WILSON. I presented the other day a resolution which I now offer in a modified form:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report, for the information of the Senate, the amounts which have been paid, or which will have to be paid, by virtue of any order given by the various Departments of Government, or by the bureaus thereof, to each of the newspapers published in the city of Washington, since the 4th of March, 1865, and the laws under which these amounts have been paid, or are to be paid. And also report if any legislation is necessary in regard to the publication of the advertisements of the Government.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BARCLAY'S DIGEST.

Mr. FOOT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to procure for the use of the Senate seventy-five copies of the work known as "Barclay's Digest." Provided, The cost thereof per copy shall not exceed that paid by the House of Representatives for the same work.

I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like very much if the Senator would add a copy of "Hickey's Constitution" for each Senator. It is an invaluable document, and I should like very much to get it.

Mr. FOOT. Let that be a separate resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood a year ago that Hickey's Constitution was out of print.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the most valuable compilation in existence. I would rather have it than Barclay's Digest.

Mr. CLARK. They are on entirely different matters.

Mr. FOOT. This is a new edition very recently published, enlarged and improved by the author. From the examination I have given it, I have no hesitation in saying that it is the best compilation of parliamentary law and practice with which I am acquainted. At the present time, with the exception of one copy of Cushing's elaborate work, there is not at the command of the Senate a single copy of any work whatever upon parliamentary law and practice.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of the Senate be appointed for the present session, to consist of five members, to be entitled the committee on ventilation, to which shall be assigned the consideration of all questions relating to the ventilation and sanitary condition of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

Mr. President, I propose to call up this resolution for action in a few days. For the present it may lie on the table.

The resolution was laid on the table.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to ascertain and inform the Senate, (1.) the names of all persons now authorized by law to act as commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States in the first, second, third, fourth, seventh, eighth, and ninth judicial circuits, respectively; (2.) the whole amount of money paid to each of said commissioners out of the Treasury, for services as commissioners, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, and in case any such commissioner be a clerk of any district or circuit court of the United States, then (3.) the total amount of commissioners' fees, or costs, exacted in causes pending in and petitions made to said courts, giving the title thereof, and the amount so exacted by him in each case, and received therein, either for himself, or any other commissioner. Also, that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain and inform the Senate (1.) the total amount of fees and emoluments of every name and character, exacted and received by each clerk of the district or circuit courts of the United States for the aforesaid circuits during the year ending June 30, 1865, and, if possible, during the six months ending December 31, 1865, giving the title of each cause, petition, or other proceeding on which such fees or costs were exacted, and the amount in each case, distinguishing between costs and fees of clerks and those of commissioners, but embracing both; also (2.) the amount of fees and emoluments of their respective offices returned by each of said clerks to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury during said year 1865.

Mr. SUMNER. I observe that the resolution is addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. Should it not be addressed to the Attorney General?

Mr. CLARK. I understand not. These accounts are, I think, in the first instance settled at the Interior Department, and then they go to the Treasury Department, and upon inquiry I find that the latter can probably furnish the information.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is aware that the Attorney General is the officer of Government who corresponds with the persons who are connected with the judiciary of our country.

Mr. CLARK. That is very true; but the Treasury Department is the place where the accounts are finally settled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Attorney General knows nothing about the accounts; they do not go to his office.

Mr. CLARK. So I suppose.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 84) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company," approved March 3, 1865; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to direct the issue of American registers to certain British-built vessels owned by American citizens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) for the benefit of certain volunteer troops of Missouri who served during the war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDERICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) for the relief of Samuel Norris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 85) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to change the name of the ship Art Union to the name George M. Barnard; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.—If there is no further morning business the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion against the United States, the pending question being on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the joint committee on reconstruction; on which the Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, the nation having passed successfully through the most terrible ordeal of four years of civil war, and having vindicated its supremacy over every foot of its vast territory, as the din of battle is hushed, and the fierce passions of the combatants have subsided, we are no longer called upon to devise means for the support of great armies, but the higher duty devolves upon us of restoring the country to a state of peaceful prosperity and happiness. In the discharge of this important duty let us not be animated by feelings of hatred and revenge toward those so recently in hostility to the national authority, but rather cultivate that spirit of friendship and forbearance so essential to our future prosperity as a great, united, and prosperous people, destined to the enjoyment of a free Government of our own construction.

The ravages of war, which have wrought such havoc with all our material interests, have been unequal to the task of destroying or subverting our form of government, and we emerge from the conflict with a Constitution intact, while the mass of our people are only the more strongly devoted to its principles by reason of the perils it has survived. It now becomes our duty to repair the damages resulting from attempts at disorganization. In the discharge of that duty we cannot, if we would, relieve ourselves from the obligations which we are under to "guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

As diverse sentiments are entertained relative to the mode of discharging this duty, I propose to examine the President's plan of restoration, involving the speedy admission of Senators and Representatives from the southern States, and then the opposite or different plan of what is popularly called reconstruction, under some kind of act to be passed by Congress, in which new conditions of admission shall be exacted. Upon examining both these plans, and contrasting them with each other, we shall be able to form a clear opinion as to our duty in this juncture of our public affairs.

The President has required several things of the southern people, and has recommended others for their acceptance; and he has done all this in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and also in his civil capacity as Chief Executive of the Republic.

As Commander-in-Chief, it was his duty to put down the rebellion and all its works, and he has done so thoroughly. At least what was left undone by his predecessor toward this end he has done most faithfully and skillfully. Armed resistance no longer continues anywhere within the limits of the United States, nor is there the slightest probability that it will be renewed.

But there were rebel State governments throughout the so-called confederate States. These have been subverted, utterly removed from the face of the earth. Regarded as revolutionary and illegal in character, they were made to give way before the power of the United States, until not a vestige of them is now left. All those hostile organizations are defunct. They are dead, and will know no resurrection. The President, believing them to be wholly invalid in point of law, and criminal in purpose, refused them the slightest recognition, and has wiped them out effectually and finally. This was his duty, and he has performed it well.

But other things beyond this were required to vindicate the authority of the United States and to stamp the rebellion as illegal and wrongful. The President has therefore required those States to repudiate their ordinances of secession in express terms, and this has been done by most of those States in reorganizing their governments upon a loyal foundation. Their constitutional conventions have declared those ordinances to be null and void. In one or two cases, I believe, they have simply repealed them, but the practical effect is in substance the same. A further requirement made by the President, and acceded to by the people of the South, has been the repudiation of all rebel indebtedness incurred in behalf of the rebellion. I believe the rebel indebtedness, or at least most of it, had its payment conditional upon the accomplishment of southern independence. It was expressly made payable when the confederate States should become independent of the United States, and their independence should be recognized. Upon the whole, I conclude the confederate creditors hold about the worst securities known upon the face of the earth. There is no such government as incurred that debt in existence, and never will be; the time fixed for payment has become impossible, and lastly, at the instance of President Johnson, the whole debt has been repudiated, as unauthorized and unlawful, by popular conventions. Little sympathy need be felt in the case for the creditors of the South, whether foreign or domestic. They loaned their money upon a speculation and took the chances of the war. In fact, the confederate loans were in the nature of a gambling transaction; they were in substance bets upon the issue or result of the war. If the confederacy triumphed, the loan-holders would make immense fortunes upon small sums invested. If it failed, they were to lose their investments, for by the express terms of their contract they were only to be paid in case the rebellion should be successful.

From this statement of the position of the confederate creditors, how unnecessary appears the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prevent the payment of the confederate debt. A debt three times dead already is to be killed a fourth time by an amendment to the Federal Constitution. The debtor—the confederate government—is dead, and has left no effects; the time of payment has become an impossible date, and President Johnson has had an express repudiation of it put in all the new southern constitutions. I think, therefore, the subject is disposed of, if it be possible to dispose of and settle any subject whatever which has once been involved in public debate.

But I will proceed with my statement of the President's policy of restoration, in order to bring out all the leading points which it involves. The rebel State governments being entirely removed from the southern country, and the civil and military authorities of the spurious confederacy put down, the scene presented in that section was one of unorganized States. The territory and the people remained, and over both the authority of the Government of the United States was reestablished; but the latter was seen mainly in the exhibition of the war power by which the rebellion had been smitten, and its political as well as martial machinery leveled to the dust. The President explains very handsomely and clearly in his annual message the views by which he was prompted at that time. For the moment, his will was law from the Potomac to the shores of the Gulf. He held in hand the largest army of modern times, an immense naval force, and stood as the representative of a flushed and triumphant nation. It is a maxim that "power is ever grasping" and ambitious of its own perpetuity; but when the ruler of a great nation, in times when turbulence seems to have relaxed the bonds of government, refuses to usurp questionable authority over a fallen foe, whose acts are so justly open to universal condemnation, he gives the strongest possible evidence of his patriotism and honesty of purpose, and furnishes a new guarantee of both the justice and strength of a republican Government.

No greater mass of power was ever held under circumstances of such transcendent importance by one man since the creation of the earth. But our patriot President was equal to the crisis. The occasion did not find him unprepared for the duties which it imposed. He remembered his oath to support the Constitution of the United States. He remembered that he was one of the people, pledged by his birth, by his early struggles, by the professions and conduct of a prolonged and illustrious career, to the republican principle of government by the people and for the people, and to the rejection of all forms of arbitrary and unconstitutional rule. While he was determined to secure the proper fruits of victory, he had no heart for works of persecution and vengeance, nor any disposition to transcend his powers and establish despotic principles in the administration of the Government. What then did he do, and what does he now propose? Let him be judged by his acts, openly performed in the face of the world, and by the recommendations of policy which he makes to Congress and to the people.

Well, sir, he called into requisition the executive power of pardon, and he has used that power efficiently in the work of restoration. Through this power he has dealt with individuals engaged in rebellion. He has restored many such to their rights, forfeited under the laws of their country, and screened them from prosecution and punishment. But was this done rashly, blindly, and without discrimination or just conditions imposed? No, sir, nothing of the sort! There was no precipitancy and no blundering! His general amnesty proclamation conformed to the policy of his predecessor, Mr. Lincoln, but he reserved from its operation large classes of cases for special action upon individual applications for pardon; and in all cases where executive clemency has been extended, an oath has been required as a guarantee of future conduct and of allegiance to the Government of the United States.

Through his exercise of the pardoning power the authority and dignity of the United States have been asserted, and those who have been unfaithful to the Government made to acknowledge their fault, to sue for clemency, and most solemnly to pledge their fealty to the United States. The general submission of the southern people since the close of the war rendered a magnanimous policy toward them possible and proper; and I believe the President has acted with great discretion and wisdom in extending amnesty and pardon to the great mass of the southern people, while withholding it thus far from particular classes or prominent offenders among them.

But his policy for restoring loyal State governments has been equally important. He did not choose to continue military occupation of the South, with its enormous expense and other attendant evils, any longer than was necessary. Troops were therefore gradually withdrawn and disbanded, and now the number remaining in that section is comparatively inconsiderable. For military rule civil rule has been substituted, and that in the only way in which it could be properly done—by the action of the people themselves. They were invited to reorganize their State governments, and they have done so, fully and completely. To this end delegates to constitutional conventions were chosen, constitutions formed, and subsequent elections for members of Legislatures, for Governors, and other officers have been held. Perfect State governments have been reestablished by the action of the people themselves in nearly all the States in question, which are republican in form, and clearly entitled to the protection of the United States under the guarantee clause of the Constitution.

I deny all power in Congress, or the President, or in both combined, to make a State constitution, or to dictate any provision which shall be contained in it. A constitution must be wholly made by the people over whom it is established, and can be made or amended by no other persons whatever. Thus have been made the new constitutions of the southern States, and their validity rests immovably upon the ground that they are thus popular in origin, while loyal in object and republican in form.

It is true that the proceedings for forming the new constitutions were initiated by provisional governors appointed by the President and acting under his direction. But this cannot affect the validity or merit of the constitutions made. The provisional governors simply invited the people to act in their sovereign capacity in reorganizing governments for themselves, which was both necessary and proper under the circumstances which then existed. There were no local authorities or officers competent to call conventions, or give them protection while in session, although a clear necessity for convening existed, if civil rule was to supplant military rule in that section of the country. Therefore the provisional governors, who represented the military power of the United States for the time being, in order to the withdrawal of that power and to the restoration of valid and loyal State governments, were authorized to invite the people to select delegates to constitutional conventions in their respective States. Those conventions met and formed constitutions which are unquestionably good and lawful, not because the making of them was instigated or invited by provisional governors, but because (as before stated) they were in fact made by the people over whom they are established, and made in accord with the Government of the United States. I am not now speaking of the exceptional cases of Louisiana, Virginia, and Arkansas, but of the other States of the South in which there was no pretense of loyal government at the close of the war, and where it was necessary, therefore, that some authority, some official or volunteer association, or person, should initiate their establishment by setting in motion the sovereign popular power which was alone competent to the work.

There is no soundness in the objection sometimes made that the southern constitutions, or some of them, were not submitted to a popular vote for adoption or rejection. The people of any State may authorize delegates, selected by them, to form a constitution, which shall be legal to all intents and purposes; and the people of some of the States of the Union are now living under constitutions thus made.

For instance, the Pennsylvania constitution of 1790, which yet exists in an amended form, was not submitted to a popular vote, but was simply proclaimed by the convention which made it. It is very well that new constitutions should, in ordinary cases, be submitted to a popular vote; and this is necessary where a law under which a convention assembles provides for such submission. But it is most absurd to say, as some have said, that a constitution cannot take effect and have authority unless adopted by a popular vote; for it is perfectly plain and undeniable, that though the people cannot strip themselves of their sovereignty, they may delegate to a representative body the exercise of sovereign powers. In fact the people would no longer be sovereign if they should be stripped of the power of appointing delegates or representatives to act for them in the making of a constitution.

In the case of Kansas the true objection was not simply that the Lecompton constitution had not been submitted to a vote of the people. In fact a part of it was submitted. The true objection was that the people of Kansas did not select the men who made the constitution, and that, therefore, it could not be taken as their "act and deed," unless they should accept or ratify it by a direct vote. But where the people do in fact select delegates to a convention, and confer upon them, expressly or impliedly, the power or authority to frame a constitution, the convention may enact a constitution, which will be valid without any additional sanction or further proceeding.

But one point further connected with the President's plan of restoration (and it is a most important one) remains to be noticed. It is the securing of emancipation to the black race in the South as a result of the war, and as a guarantee of future quiet and harmony to the nation. Emancipation, now fully accomplished, both in law and fact, rests upon the following foundations:

1. The proclamation of President Lincoln of January 1, 1863.

2. His subsequent amnesty proclamation, so far as the same was accepted or acted upon by individuals in the southern country.

3. The direct action of military force during the war, in conformity with executive policy, and, to some extent, under the authority of laws enacted by Congress.

4. The amnesty proclamation of President Johnson, of 1865, and subsequent special pardons granted by him; amnesty and pardon being extended upon conditions which involved emancipation and furnished securities for carrying out the previous policy of the President and Congress on that subject.

5. The adoption, by the Legislatures of the several reorganized States, of the proposed amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery generally and for all future time within the United States, and conferring upon Congress adequate power to enforce the prohibition.

Upon the last two heads the President speaks as follows in his annual message:

"In exercising that power [the power of pardon] I have taken every precaution to connect it with the clearest recognition of the binding force of the laws of the United States, and an unqualified acknowledgment of the great social change of condition in regard to slavery which has grown out of the war."

The executive power of amnesty and pardon was ample to cover and justify what was done. In other words, it was competent for the President to attach conditions to pardons granted. He proceeds in his message to say:

"The next step which I have taken to restore the constitutional relations of the States has been an invitation to them to participate in the high office of amending the Constitution." "It is not too much to ask, in the name of the whole people, that on the one side the plan of restoration shall proceed in conformity with a willingness to cast the disorders of the past into oblivion, and that, on the other, the evidence of sincerity in the future maintenance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution which provides for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of our country."

This "invitation" to the southern States has been complied with by them. They have, through their Legislatures, adopted the constitutional amendment, and thus made it a part of the fundamental law of the United States.

I have thus gone over several features of the President's policy of restoration, so far as the same relates to the action of his department of the Government; and however much nice critics, captious men, or interested agitators may be disposed to find fault with it and condemn it, either in whole or in part, I believe the great mass of the people of this country will heartily approve and indorse it. In fact, the evidences of such approval come to us from every quarter; they multiply daily; and cheer and invigorate the friends of reunion and of constitutional rule. What, then, remains for Congress to do to perfect restoration, to carry out the policy which the President has begun? In his annual message the President addresses Congress as follows:

"The amendment to the Constitution being adopted, it would remain for States whose powers have been so long in abeyance to resume their places in the two branches of the national Legislature, and thereby complete the work of restoration. Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you, for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

The meaning of this important passage cannot be misunderstood. The language is remarkable and peculiar in form. It is addressed to the members of each House separately and distinctly, and suggests to them the performance of a duty under the provision of the Constitution which makes the respective Houses judges of questions relating to membership. This is a power to be exercised by each House for itself, quite independent of and uninfluenced by the other House.

The duty is judicial in its nature and not legislative, and one of the gravest character. And the power is so clear, and its exercise so necessary to the restoration of the Union, that the President, as it was proper for him to do, has in emphatic language called the attention of Congress to its performance. And in addressing the members of each House, in their separate capacity, he has used language suited to the inculcation of the constitutional duty, and distinguished it from all those duties which are to be performed by the two Houses in their joint or legislative capacity.

In his communication to the Senate of December 18, in answer to a resolution of inquiry, the President further says:

"From all the information in my possession, and from that which I have recently derived from the most reliable authority, I am induced to cherish the belief that sectional animosity is surely and rapidly merging itself into a spirit of nationality, and that representation, connected with a properly adjusted system of taxation, will result in a harmonious restoration of the relations of the States to the national Government."

We have here, in these extracts, the opinion of the President upon the question of what should be done at this juncture by Congress, or rather by the respective Houses of Congress, in the work of restoration. The representation of the southern States is to be restored by appropriate action of each House under a clear constitutional power, the exercise of which will be completely efficacious to the object in view.

Thus the Union can be restored in its integrity, and all questions connected with its restoration disposed of forever.

Why, then, should not the Senate and House, respectively, proceed to consider the questions of membership which are brought before them, and decide them upon the same principles of wisdom, magnanimity, and patriotism, which have characterized the President's conduct and policy with reference to the southern States? What good object is to be subserved by keeping open the question of restoration, and delaying to the country the enjoyment of the fruits of victory and peace? These questions do not concern the people of the South alone. They are interesting and important to the people of the whole country. It is desirable, in the judgment of intelligent and patriotic men everywhere throughout the land, that all the relations between the sections which were interrupted by the war should be restored at the earliest possible moment.

Let commerce revive; let trade resume its ceaseless activity; let social intercourse succeed to estrangement and division, and let the political bonds of union be renewed in all the strength and brightness of former times.

But there are men who are dissatisfied with the prospect of these results. There are men who decry the President's policy and pronounce it a failure. There are men who are not satisfied with complete victory in the war; with emancipation secured by constitutional provisions, repudiation of rebel indebtedness, and complete submission of the southern people to the laws and jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and their sincere, generous, and earnest proffer of allegiance and devotion to it. They seek to delay reunion, and to impose further conditions upon the southern people as the price of conceding it. What those conditions shall be does not very clearly appear, as scarcely any two men among the objectors agree entirely in their definition and statement. But some of them are sufficiently evident already, and may be made the topics of immediate discussion.

They are to be presented through laws enacted by Congress, and in propositions for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

But, before they are discussed, it will be proper to notice briefly some of the reasons which appeal to Congress in favor of the President's policy of immediate restoration.

The recognition of the reorganized State governments, by the admission of Senators and Representatives, is due to the loyal men of the South who assisted in their formation and now adhere to them, not only as instruments of local government, but also for securing renewed representation in the Government of the United States. This class of men, our brothers and friends, have a merit above and beyond that which belongs to men of the North. Their devotion to the Government was maintained under appalling difficulties. They have suffered severely, and they now look to immediate restoration as necessary to their interests and welfare. Their appeal is not to be resisted or postponed unless overwhelming considerations of necessity or policy demand it. These State governments have been organized in concert with the President of the United States, and in accordance with a policy proposed by him as the Chief Magistrate of the nation. So far as he could reasonably act on behalf of the people of the United States, in the work of reconstruction, we are bound in good faith to sustain the arrangements made at his instance, and accept Representatives from the reorganized States.

By prompt recognition, we conciliate the people of the South, and attach them more firmly to ourselves for the future. In this case, unanimity is safety; for we will obtain by it additional security against future dangers. We will "consolidate the Union;" that is, we will strengthen it, render its bonds firm, repress disaffection, and remove all possibility of foreign intrigue in that section hereafter.

By immediate recognition we will promote and insure the prosperity of both sections. Capital will go more promptly into the South for investment; production there will be incited; trade and commerce will revive, and sources of revenue to the public Treasury will be opened and enlarged.

Recognition relieves us from a vast burden of expense in maintaining civil and military establishments of government, and from the inconvenience and scandals arising from conflicting jurisdictions in administration.

Recognition and representation in Congress establish and maintain a republican principle vital to our system and sanctified to us by the struggles of our fathers. We tax the South, and we shall tax it heavily hereafter. The public necessities and the principle of equal taxation make this a necessity. But it will be unjust, odious, and anti-republican, to tax them without admitting them to representation in that Government by which the taxes are imposed.

Finally, by recognition and renewed representation in Congress, we restore all the great interests of the country, and they will again have a due voice in the Government, and participate in the debates by which its policy is shaped and determined. And it will be particularly useful, as well as just, that upon questions affecting the southern people their Representatives shall be heard before the laws by which they are to be bound shall be enacted.

It is further to be remarked that these reorganized State governments can be recognized with much more propriety than those set up or proposed during the war under Mr. Lincoln's one-tenth plan. In the first place, they are established after the return of peace, and not during the pressure of military operations.

They are, to a great extent, free from the objection urged against the Lincoln States, of being formed within the theater of actual war, and therefore, of necessity, mere creations and creatures of military power. In the next place, they are established in each State by a clear majority of the people and not by a minority, thus conforming, in a most vital particular, to true republican principles.

Some people think, or pretend to think, that the southern States have been out of the Union, and that an act of Congress is necessary to readmit or restore them. It is true that a part of the people South voted to go out of the Union, and took up arms to sustain that resolution. That is undeniably true. But we said that they should not go out, and we made war to compel them to remain. The contest between them and us was to determine whether their resolution or ours, upon this very point of going out, should prevail. They were beaten in the war; their object frustrated, its realization prevented. They did not get out of the Union because they failed in the war. Success would have taken them out; failure left them in. That is the simple truth and the whole truth upon this subject, and the conclusion follows that no act of Congress is necessary to their restoration.

I see, therefore, no objection upon grounds of principle to the President's policy of restoration so far as he has carried it, nor to its consummation and complete fulfillment by the admission of Senators and Representatives by Congress. On the contrary, the reasons which support that policy are numerous, weighty, and decisive.

In contrast with the policy advocated by the President is that known as the radical policy, which proceeds upon the hypothesis that negro suffrage is a certain and sure remedy for all the evils which afflict the State. I look upon the remedy as worse than the disease, as it imposes a lasting and permanent evil for one of a temporary character. An attempt to dilute and weaken the intelligence upon which the safety of our free institutions is founded can only be followed by disastrous results.

If the inherent and superior intelligence of the white man is incapable of directing and perpetuating our form of Government, God defend us from an appeal to African auxiliaries for the consummation of that grand result.

The right of suffrage implicitly carries with it the right of governing by holding office, and against the lodgment of such powers in the hands of the late slaves I enter my solemn protest. I admit that it is not the fault of the African, the Indian, or the Asiatic, that his skin is not white, or that he does not exhibit those great characteristics which qualify him to govern the white race, and I am not disposed to inflict punishment upon the African because, while our white ancestors were contending for civil and religious liberty, his were the nude barbarians engaged in eating or selling those whom the fortunes of war placed within their power upon their native deserts. God made the distinction in creating the races, and by an immutable law he made their permanent commingling an impossibility. Where the white race predominates it governs, and in Africa and Hayti, where the negro is the dominant race, he governs, and sedulously excludes the white man from any participation. And while I do not propose to reenact the ordinances of Providence, I am an advocate of the maintenance of the distinction of the races, socially and politically.

Notwithstanding the denunciations which have been hurled against the sentiment, I still believe that this is a white man's Government, framed by white men, and for white men; instituted by their wisdom and defended by their valor. In saying this, I do not mean to be understood as asserting that the negroes, the Indians, or any other inferior races should be excluded from the natural rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; but I do mean to say that the hardy, persevering, industrious, brave, and intelligent Anglo-Saxon race and their descendants, who brought civilization and the arts into the New World, and who have organized, defended, and perpetuated free government here, are not to be overridden and have a governmental policy dictated to them by any semi-barbarous inferiors, who have never evinced the intelligence here, nor in their own country, necessary to better their own condition; who have never had inventive genius to improve upon the rudeness of the most barbarous life; who have never had the courage to assert and maintain a respectable Government anywhere.

A stroke of the pen and sword combined has stricken the fetters from the limbs of the slave, but has left him, in point of intelligence, but little the superior of the brute creation or the inanimate objects by which he is surrounded. The stroke of neither the pen nor sword can relieve the emancipated slave of his servile instincts and fit him at once for the judicious exercise of the right of suffrage. He is as ignorant and passive to-day as he was before a drop of the white man's blood was shed to secure his emancipation, and he will be no better to-morrow. By forcibly thrusting upon him the right of suffrage, of which he has no adequate comprehension, you either leave him the dupe of his old master, to be voted at his will, or force him into an unequal contest with your own race, who, since anything has been known of them, have either enslaved or exterminated every other race with which they have come in contact.

It seems to me unreasonable that we should be called upon at this day to discuss a question of extending suffrage to a race who are notoriously unfit to exercise it intelligently and wisely. But surprise at this fact will be lessened when we consider that those who are most anxious to secure negro suffrage, who are most ardent and boisterous in its favor, are precisely those persons who know least about the negro, and are least qualified to judge and determine any question of policy concerning him. There is no extensive sentiment anywhere in the southern States in favor of negro suffrage. What is thought on that subject in this city of Washington was determined recently by an almost unanimous vote of the qualified citizens against it. Advancing northward, we find constitutional provisions established in most of the central States to preclude all legislative action upon the subject. Only when we arrive in the extreme North, where this race is scarcely known as an element of population, do we find any considerable sentiment in favor of degrading the elective franchise to the level of negro intelligence and capacity. And even in recent elections held in Connecticut, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, decided majorities were given against the extension of suffrage to the small number of negroes resident in those States. Upon the Pacific coast, I am sure, the people are opposed to suffrage by negroes, by Asiatics, or by Indians found within their borders, and they will long remain so. In short, if negro suffrage were submitted, at this hour, to a vote of the whole electoral population of the United States, I believe they would decide against it by a vote of four to one. Even the negroes themselves do not demand or ask it, except where they are instigated or influenced by white men whose trade is agitation and whose purpose is mischief. It is clear, then, that public opinion does not demand from Congress any legislation or action whatsoever looking to negro suffrage. The cry for it is the clamor of faction and not the voice of the people.

It is equally clear and certain that Congress has no rightful power to determine a question of suffrage in any State; that an attempt to do so would be a usurpation, and directly opposed to the fundamental division of powers between the States and the Federal Government.

But negro suffrage would not be desirable or useful, but, on the contrary, pernicious, even if no impediment existed in public opinion, or in constitutional law. It would inevitably degrade and corrupt elections, and that to an extent fearful to contemplate. Electoral privilege is a trust as well as a right. It is, in fact, a public duty rather than a personal privilege; a duty of the gravest importance, and requiring independence, intelligence, and virtue in a high degree to its proper exercise. Its strongest and most persistent advocates are to be found among politicians who perceive the true relation between cause and effect; that ignorance can be made to count hugely at elections, and that party organizations, and public men who would not be upheld by the intelligence of the country; and, by its aid, riot in place and wield the scepter of public power.

With all the justice, patriotism, and magnanimity which we may claim for the States now represented upon this floor, how few of them have become convinced of the propriety of conferring the right of suffrage upon the few and comparatively intelligent negroes to be found within their borders? If the experiment under such favorable circumstances becomes of doubtful propriety with our own States, where is the justice or propriety of our forcing it upon other States, where the African has not had time to commence his recovery from the debasing effects of the most degraded servitude?

The propriety of universal suffrage among our own race has long been a debatable question among the warmer friends of republican institutions, and while it is difficult to fix any boundaries for the intelligence which shall authorize its exercise, it is conceded by all that there is danger in conferring it upon those who are ignorant of our Government and institutions. Examples are not wanting of the restrictions which have been imposed by States against its universality. The Indian, with all his native sagacity and the noble attributes awarded to him by Utopian writers, has been almost universally denied its exercise. In times of political excitement parties have been enabled to feign amendments upon State constitutions which excluded white persons of foreign birth whose political sentiments were not in unison with the progressive and transcendental theories of intolerant majorities.

But, sir, admitting, for argument's sake, the propriety of conferring the right of suffrage indiscriminately upon everything that walks upright upon two feet, what right has Congress to meddle with this question within the States of the Union? By an appeal to arms you have reduced the citizens of the southern States to a condition of obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States. You and I denied their pretended assumption of the right to take their States out of the Union. They appealed to arms as the last resort to enforce their pretended rights of secession. We met them openly and squarely upon that issue, and wrung from them a verdict, at the cost of hundreds of thousands of lives and thousands of millions of dollars. In this verdict they now acquiesce; and are we, in the moment of victory, to be guilty of the folly of turning around and conceding all their claims by admitting that they are no longer States of the Union, bound to observe its Constitution and yield obedience to its laws, and reciprocally entitled to its protection and rights? Such action would be a surrender to the rebels, by legislation, of more than they have been able to wring from us by arms, and would be a practical ratification of their secession ordinances, and a dissolution of the Union by act of Congress.

Why should we involve ourselves in the paradoxical absurdity of denying the right of secession, of fighting them for four years to enforce that denial, and when they admit their failure by the last arbitrament, turn round and admit that they have accomplished their purpose, and are to-day outside the Union? The rebellion having been a failure on the part of those who inaugurated it, it would seem the height of folly on the part of those who resisted it so successfully to dignify it with all the consequences of a success. If, as I believe, they have not achieved the object for which they began the war, and their insurrection has been suppressed, it would seem that nothing has occurred to change their political relations to the Union, and they must be still States composing its integral parts. Every department of this Government has so recognized them in some form or other, and I take it that they are as much States in the Union to-day as though their citizens had never committed treason against it. The crime of treason can only be committed by individuals, and whether they are pardoned or punished for the offense cannot affect the condition of the body-politic of which they may happen to be members.

It is a well-known fact that in many of those States a minority of the people assumed to sever the connection of the State with the Union, and that the majority were forced to succumb in some instances to de facto governments forced upon them by a minority of their own citizens, aided by rebel forces drawn from other revolted States. In this view of the facts, if we are to admit that States thus situated have been taken out of the Union, it becomes an interesting question to know exactly how small a minority, aided by troops from other States, may be able, under the influence of such auxiliaries, to effect a legal consummation of the proposed act. It might also be the subject of inquiry to know to what extent the loyal and non-seceding majority were bound by such acts under duress. It is said that troops from neighboring States surrounded the convention at Little Rock, in Arkansas, and by threats and intimidation forced members elected as Union men to vote for the ordinance of secession. If Lee, in one of his advances into Pennsylvania, had, by the same means, effected the same results with a Legislature or convention at Harrisburg, and subsequently the people in Pennsylvania, or a majority of them, had been conscripted and placed in the rebel army; after the invaders had been driven from the State as they have been from the southern States, would any man claim that Pennsylvania was no longer a State of this Union; and that in consequence of her soil being invaded and her people overcome by rebel hordes, that her relation to the Union was changed, and that in consequence of these results her altered relations to the Union were such as to authorize Congress to interfere in her internal policy, or alter her suffrage laws? If it is claimed that such a secession from the Union, under such circumstances, was null and void, and ought not to alter the relations of Pennsylvania toward the Union, I answer that all acts of secession are equally null and void, and cannot change the relations which a State bears toward the Federal Constitution.

The ridiculous and absurd acts of the pretended and fugitive Legislatures of Kentucky and Missouri, by which those bodies pretended to sever the relations of their respective States with the Federal Union, were as valid as the similar attempts at the same thing by the conventions of South Carolina and Mississippi. If they were not, and if Missouri and Kentucky are not to-day as effectually out of the Union as any other States, I should like to have some casuist upon the question of legal and constitutional secession explain the reason why. Yet no one seems to question the right of Missouri or Kentucky to be represented here, and I suppose that their cases are exceptional because they did not legally secede.

Well, sir, if those States did not legally secede, would it not be well to inquire into the legality of the similar attempts upon the part of other States, and if it should turn out that none of them have seceded legally, the natural inference would be that none of them could legally be denied that representation upon this floor and that immunity from Federal interference in their internal affairs which the Constitution of the United States awards to them.

Mr. President, I have been astonished, when I have read the speeches of men who are supposed to be endowed with common sense, to observe the subterfuges and expedients to which they have resorted to prove by specious and silly arguments that the southern States have actually seceded and dissolved this Union. The advocates of the finality of secession, in their attempts to prove that it has been consummated, notwithstanding its unconstitutionality, complacently adduce what they suppose a parallel in the case of murder, and suppose that they are demolishing all arguments against their theory, by complacently, and with apparent triumph, asserting that the laws prohibit murder, therefore murder cannot be committed. I pity the statesman or lawyer who is driven to such sub-terfuges of the pettifogger to sustain so transparent a fallacy. Murder, like other crimes, is punished by a local law, and its perpetration is constantly occurring and being punished. The restriction finds a place in our great fundamental law which declares that—

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

This is an assertion of the supremacy of the Constitution, and when its violation is attempted the courts have never admitted the success of such attempts, but have invariably stamped them as nullities, and void, because of their legal impossibility. I should hope that there are but few men in our country who are unable to comprehend the distinction between a criminal statute and a great constitutional restriction.

It is urged as an objection against the recognition of those States that their Legislatures might not be in unison with some other States. The same objection might be urged against the internal policy of any of the other States of this Union, and only furnishes an argument in favor of the obliteration of all States, leaving the legislation of what is now called the United States to be consummated by a great centralized Government established here at the national capital. I have never been an advocate of State rights except when they were exercised in subordination to that paramount law known as the Constitution of the United States. I know that the States lately in rebellion are not the only ones which have at times attempted to assert such right in derogation of the Constitution. We have had some late and costly experience in the way of ultra State-rights doctrine. Let us avoid the other extreme, and escape the evils likely to result from an attempted consolidation of all the rights of the States in a centralized Government.

While the southern people were engaged in armed hostility to the Government and the Constitution, no one was more anxious than myself to see their spurious government overthrown, and their military power broken, in order that the Constitution and laws of the United States might reassert their sway. To accomplish these ends I urged the adoption of a vigorous conscription law, with an abolition of exemption and commutation clauses, which, if adopted, would have crushed the military power of the South at an early period. I desired to infuse a vigor into the war which met with the stern reprobation of extreme partisans of all classes upon this floor. Now that our armies have been triumphant everywhere, and the people of those States lately in revolt are suing for mercy and pardon, it is not in my nature to inflict humiliating outrages upon them, or to demand that they should be reduced to an equality with their late slaves.

It is but natural, when we contemplate the enormity of the crime committed by those people in their mad attempt to destroy such a Government as ours, and which the most of their leaders were sworn to support, that we should desire to inflict upon them such punishments as are demanded by broken laws and a violated Constitution; and I do not pretend to say that the great leaders in those terrible crimes which have plunged the country into mourning and involved us in a debt of gigantic proportions should escape at least some of the legal consequences of their own deliberate acts. Yet we should, as far as the mass of the people are concerned, extend to them that godlike attribute of mercy, and remember that Christianity, combined with modern civilization, has long since exploded the idea that the wholesale shedding of blood is a panacea for crimes against the State. Let us not leave a record behind us parallel to the state trials of England and the reign of terror in France, when it was supposed that the most terrible punishments worked the most salutary reforms. James II, with a facious brutality, characterized the wholesale slaughter which followed the abortive attempt of the Duke of Monmouth to revolutionize England, in 1685, as "the campaigns of the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys in the west." The name of that cruel and weak-minded monarch has been handed down to posterity coupled with the most blood-thirsty and atrocious villainies that ever disgraced the forms of human justice, and the name of Jeffreys is only remembered to be detested and execrated in every clime where civilization has extended. The terrible examples of bloodshed in France, during the reign of terror, have met with a like condemnation. It is gratifying to all friends of popular freedom and constitutional liberty, when we reflect that in our late contest, where all the worst passions of human nature were aroused, and when our soldiers, as prisoners, had been treated with a barbarity utterly indefensible, that when our enemies were subdued and within our power there was no clamor for blood.

Humanity and reason have with our people maintained a sway which in almost any other country have at some time been usurped by hatred, vengeance, and bloodshed. Such an exhibition of magnanimity and mercy is alike creditable to our people and our institutions.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the people of the South had no just cause for the commencement of the rebellion, let us be careful not to furnish them with one for the justification of similar attempts in the future, by forcing upon them taxation without representation, and thus placing them where they can avail themselves of the precedent sanctified by the struggles of our revolutionary fathers. Though they have been confessedly in the wrong, and have committed a great crime, let us not violate our own sense of justice by heaping upon them the very outrages which justified the Colonies in resisting a similar tyrannical exercise of power upon the part of Great Britain.

Look at this great question as you will, and from any stand-point, the conviction is forced upon your mind that we are to constitute in the future one great nation, and must live together as one people, professing the same religion, speaking the same language, and bound together by the traditions of the past and the hopes of the future. If this be true, is it not better for us to forget and forgive the past than to revive and keep alive the hateful animosities which have come so near causing our mutual destruction? I trust and believe that the time will come when all the fierce passions and hatred engendered by the war will have subsided, and when we shall become a more united people than before, with homogeneous institutions, bound together by a common sentiment of love and admiration for free government and constitutional liberty. Posterity will view, through the medium of impartial history, the acts and achievements of the public men of the present age, and the time in which we now live and act our part will be referred to as the most portentous of any period of the past. The terrible crisis through which we have just passed will be referred to as demonstrating the power of a republican form of government, and as conclusive proof that the people have the capacity to administer and preserve it. Let us, then, in the language of the President, "cast the disorders of the past into oblivion." Let the children of those who have met upon the field of carnage imitate the generosity of their fathers, who could shake hands and share the rude comforts of the bivouac with those so lately their mortal enemies; and let us hope that both sections may cultivate and foster that spirit of concord which shall make our Union in reality "one and inseparable."

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything at this time upon this great subject of reconstruction, because it appeared to me better that we should await the action of the committee that we have appointed and charged with the duty of enlightening us upon the subject; but I have heard so much that seems to be entirely aside of the difficulties that occur to my mind on this subject that I think I ought not to fail at this time to express some opinions that I entertain; and especially as the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] in the long, labored, and able speech that he made yesterday almost entirely failed to touch any of the difficulties that are laboring in my mind.

The Senator began by invoking the principles and aid of the preceding Administration, and informed us that the present Administration was proceeding upon the same principles that Mr. Lincoln had adopted. It is true that Mr. Lincoln had entered upon a certain policy in regard to the admission of some of these States; the question was agitated before us, I believe, during the whole period of the last Congress; but, notwithstanding my anxiety to find some way by which these States could be safely admitted into the Union again, all the arguments that were made for that purpose during that whole Congress entirely failed to convince me that the time had arrived when it was safe to admit any of them; and therefore, for one, I contended against it, and with a good deal of zeal; and for that I, with some others here, was accused of being a little factious, and sometimes it was said we filibustered against the will of the majority to keep these States out.

Now, sir, I wish to say that in my judgment President Johnson has made a great improvement upon the state of things that existed during the last Congress, although, as yet, he has not reached the point where I think the difficulty begins. Mr. Lincoln advised us to admit Louisiana into the Union at a time when, probably, more than one half her territory was trampled beneath the hostile feet of the enemy. Our flag did not cover her territory, and perhaps not half her population, when he thought it would be safe to permit her to come back into the councils of the nation and participate with us Union men in the great work of legislation. I had not seen anything in the proceedings of the people there that warranted me in saying that that would be safe, and therefore I thought it best to make what stand I could against that measure. You will recollect, sir, that Mr. Lincoln did not then require, if I recollect right, in order to the admission, anything more than that one tenth part of the population of Louisiana should take a certain oath, and that not a very difficult one, and when they had done that the State was to be in a condition to be admitted. Mr. Johnson, I repeat, has made an improvement, and a great improvement, upon all this, for he does require, if I understand him, that they, by their fundamental law, shall abolish slavery; he requires at their hands that they shall repudiate the rebel debt; he requires that they shall renounce the right of secession; he requires that they shall agree to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery forever. These, in my judgment, are great improvements upon the system adopted by Mr. Lincoln. Had Mr. Lincoln himself, at that period, required these things, and had the States assented to them, I believe I should then have yielded to his wishes and given my support to the measure.

But, Mr. President, in the counsels that I have given and the measures that I have advocated in the Senate, I have ever had one polar star to guide my action, and to that I adhere whether I am in the majority or the minority, and I never intend to be tempted from it one single inch. I fix my eye upon the great principle of eternal justice, and it has borne me triumphantly through all difficulties in my legislative career since I have had a seat here. I say triumphantly; for, sir, I have stood upon this floor when I had not ten men to support me against the entire Senate, and when the principles that I advocated were infinitely more unpopular here than those that I announce to-day. How were the whole Senate startled at the idea of universal emancipation fifteen years ago, ten years ago; yes, sir, five years ago! Talk not to me about unpopular doctrines, and endeavor not to intimidate me by the intimation that I shall be found in a minority among the people! I know them better. I think I know that I tread in the great path of rectitude and right, and I care not who opposes me. God Almighty is my guide; He, going before to strengthen my hand, has never failed me yet, and I do not fear that He will do so on this occasion.

Mr. President, I will not boast, but I, with many others upon this floor, can look back to our precedent course upon this subject, I think, with great satisfaction. I think we may say with St. Paul, "we have fought the good fight." We are not entirely through it, I admit, as he was. We may have a little further to go in the same direction, but our path is much easier than it was then.

Mr. CLARK. We keep the faith.

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, I keep the faith, and I have no doubt of a final triumph. I never feared it. I never had the least doubt how this whole question would be settled. It will all come right if we are true to our convictions.

Mr. WILSON. We will be.

Mr. WADE. I have no doubt of it. I do not fear my associates on this great question. I wish, sir, and I wish nothing more heartily, that I could agree exactly with the President's view of the subject and go along with him in the smooth path to a final and speedy adjustment of this whole question; but there are things in that path which prevent my seeing the way clearly. I give the President full credit for all that he has done, and I honor him for the pertinacious manner in which he has insisted on the great guarantees to which I have already alluded. He has commenced, as it were, to build this great arch of freedom aright; he has laid the foundations deep upon the rock of justice and truth; he has demanded that slavery be abolished. I agree with him in this, and I honor him because he has stood firmly by this demand, and he stands firmly by it now. All these requisitions that he has demanded of the South are right, but he has failed to put the keystone on the arch that he has built, and if you leave it as it is it will go to ruin.

When this great question is settled, I want it to be finally and entirely disposed of. I do not wish to be fighting eternally about slavery and distinctions of rights and privileges among the American people. I say to President Johnson, to the Democratic party, to the people of the United States, that I will never yield this controversy until all men in America shall stand precisely upon the same platform, equal before the law in every respect. When that shall have been secured, I shall give up this great controversy in which I have been engaged so many years, and no man will be more rejoiced than myself that I shall be relieved from it.

I listened carefully to the elaborate argument of the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday, for I knew it was the announcement of the doctrines of the Administration most ably set forth, most deliberately prepared, meditated upon long, written and probably printed in advance and submitted for its consideration beforehand; but I do not know how that was.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps as the Senator appeals to me upon that point, I may be indulged in stating, as I do most distinctly, that so far as the speech I made yesterday is concerned, I have had no consultation with any member of the Administration in regard to it; neither with the President nor any member of the Cabinet. I expressed my own opinions.

Mr. WADE. I only surmised what I stated; I did not know it to be a fact. I thought it might be so from the surroundings that I saw here; from some part of the audience that listened to the speech. It seems I was mistaken as to that, but it makes no difference. The Senator is undoubtedly the organ of the Administration upon this subject.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to state that I certainly do not stand in any such relation to the Administration any more than any other Senator upon this floor. There are certain points in which perhaps I agree with the opinions of the President more than the Senator from Ohio, but I claim no more right to speak for the President than the Senator himself.

Mr. WADE. I do not know that the Senator does so claim, but I know that it has been generally considered that he was more familiar with the views of the President on this subject than the rest of us. Perhaps this may be a mistake, but it does not make much difference how the fact is. I listened yesterday attentively to his able argument, in which he put forth undoubtedly all the views in favor of the policy he advocated that occurred to him or that he could muster into its service, and his speech was more remarkable for what it did not say than for what it did. I do not remember that in the whole course of his speech he spoke of the fate of those four million human beings whose rights are involved in this controversy—rights which to him are dearer than life; nay, sir, he would sooner sacrifice his own son upon the altar than consent that he should not stand upon an equal footing with his neighbor upon the question of suffrage. If there were no such element involved in this controversy, I, like him, perhaps, should find no very great difficulty in the way, but would allow things to go on smoothly and quietly. It would be a very harmless and unimportant controversy if it was barely to settle the question whether the rebel States in a metaphysical point of view are in the Union or out of it. The Senator cited Mr. Lincoln's last speech, or dying declaration, as he called it, in which Mr. Lincoln himself alluded to that very question, and said that it (which was so emphatic and so large a part of the Senator's argument) had in his judgment little or nothing to do with the subject. I do not pretend to quote Mr. Lincoln's exact words, but he said, "Enough that the seceded States do not maintain such a relation to the Government that they can be admitted without congressional aid," or to that effect. The Senator did not quote that portion of Mr. Lincoln's speech.

But, Mr. President, I care very little what great names say on these subjects. No man honors the memory of Mr. Lincoln more than I do, but I do not invoke his opinions here as controlling. Upon the floor of the Senate of the United States I look all around for counsel; I am willing to be enlightened from any quarter which can give me light with regard to my duty; and I would as soon look to it from a humble source as from the President or any other man standing in high official position. They are but poor, mortal men at last, and a Senator of the United States has no right to yield his opinions to mortal men. He is sent here for no such purpose. I like to have the aid of the Executive, according to the constitutional idea, to advise me as to the measures and principles that he thinks ought to be adopted; and no man will listen to him with a more willing ear than myself; but unless his advice squares with my idea of duty, I discard it as a Senator as I would that of any other man standing in any other position.

Sir, the great question that it now devolves upon us to settle is one from which we cannot shrink; it is for Congress and nobody else to settle. If we settle it and it be wrong, we cannot justify ourselves by saying that we took the advice of the President of the United States, or of Mr. Lincoln, who is now dead. Although his memory is revered by all, his counsels will be no justification to us if we make a mistake upon this great and perilous question that is looming up before us in portentous magnitude. I say, Senators, look to yourselves, take counsel of your own judgment and conscience, of your duty to God and your country, and look less abroad and less to great men, because if there were ever a question before you that was peculiarly your own it is this. Where in the Constitution can be found any authority given to the President to provide for bringing States into this Union? Nowhere; but we, the representatives of the people of the United States in Congress assembled, sent here to do their will under the Constitution of the United States, are the only tribunal to decide as to the admission of a State. We are the only body that ought in a free Government to declare upon what principles a State that is outside of the legislative department shall be admitted to participate in it. I do not care for that purpose whether the community is a Territory of the United States, or a State which has forfeited all right or all ability to act for itself. Such questions are ours; they do not belong to the President of the United States; and if they did this free Government of ours, of which we boast so much, would be the most concentrated despotism upon the face of the earth. While we encroach not a hair upon the province of the Executive, let us stand firmly upon our basis under the Constitution, and do that which is our duty before the people of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, a word upon the subject which the Senator from Wisconsin did not touch. Here are four million people to be ostracized from this Government, to be made serfs forever, notwithstanding the declaration of their freedom, unless some way be contrived by which their rights shall be guaranteed. I was one of those who early advocated the bringing of colored men into the Army and invoking their aid to put down the rebellion. Over and over and over again I urged it upon the Executive, as a member of the committee on the conduct of the war, and in my private capacity, and in every other way, long before that policy took effect. I feel that according to the powers with which I was invested I did as much as I could to bring the Executive and Congress up to the mark of invoking to the aid of the Union the colored people in the Army and Navy and where ever else they could assist us. What was implied in all that? Did it not force upon me a duty? Would I lend my voice and my vote to seduce or compel that people to jeopardize their lives in defense of their country, and then turn them over to the mercy of their enemies?

Sir, the man who would do it, deliberately and knowingly, is the meanest of all God's creation. Having tempted them into the struggle, having induced them to fight through the war and hazard their lives in your defense, having by this course incensed the whole rebel population against them, will you desert them and leave them in the hands of their vindictive enemies to be destroyed? The Senator from Wisconsin did not allude to them; all his sympathy was with the rebels, the men who endeavored to destroy your Constitution, the men who buried three or four hundred thousand of your bravest sons. My friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] sympathizes with them, too. The brave colored men, weak and uninfluential in themselves, but who gave you the strongest aid, and without whom I do not know that you could have got through successfully, have no part in these gentlemen's sympathies. Those who slew our brethren, scoundrel traitors to God and man, are now the objects of their sympathy. In all their long speeches they cannot think of the four millions whom we brought on our side, and who imperiled their lives to give us most important aid. They sympathize rather with those who, instead of sympathy, deserve a halter!

There is another question which the Senator from Wisconsin did not touch. I do not remember that he said a single word as to the temper and disposition of the people whom he seeks now to bring into the Government. All he had to say was that a promise had been extorted from them that they would abolish slavery, or that they had abolished it in form; but how are you going to guaranty that? What provision have they made to make that secure? I shall never desert them. My honor, my sense of justice, is aroused upon this subject. I have invoked their aid in the Army; I have agreed to protect them in their freedom, and so far as my exertions go they shall be, whatever else may come. He said nothing about all this; he did not tell us precisely what it was that he would do; and now, after having listened to his elaborate speech, I do not know whether he would let these States right in now without any further inquiry on the subject or not. He argued to show that these States had never been outside of the Union, but that the moment the insurrection was put down or suppressed they were in their original place, and apparently had nothing else to do than to come up here and legislate for us; and for all his speech told us, our old enemies on this floor, whom we banished for treason, may come back here to-day if their people see fit to send them.

Permit me now, sir, to say a word on the question of constitutional law, as to whether the seceded States were out of the Union or in it. I agree with Mr. Lincoln, in thinking that in settling the question before us it is not very material to decide this point; for if, as he said, their relation to the Union is such that they cannot participate in the Government without the action of Congress, it matters little whether you call them outside of the Union or in it; the question will principally turn upon whether their temper and disposition are such that it is safe to trust them in the councils of the nation.

I have but a word to say about that question, because I do not consider it a question of very great importance; but I think the distinction which the mind of any statesman would make is very obvious. If a portion of the inhabitants of a State of this Union have raised their arms against the General Government and the State, for they cannot oppose the one without opposing the other, and the State is all organized and intact, aiding the Union to put down that rebellion, the State is not out of the Union, does not lose her organization, but stands intact, and the moment such an insurrection is put down the State stands as she did before. But when the whole State becomes contaminated, when it is so permeated by treason that all its officers, from the Governor to the lowest office-holder, are displaced and thrown out of their position under the Government, if the people have organized their State on a basis of opposition to the General Government and declared war upon it, so that resistance to the rebellion within the State has entirely ceased, the State, as such, loses its right to be considered as an integral part of the General Government.

It will not do to tell me that there are scattering men in these States who did not agree to all these proceedings, for there never was a war, either civil or public, in which there could not be found some men in both nations who were opposed to the war, and who so expressed themselves. We know that during the war of the Revolution many of the most eminent statesmen of Great Britain sided with us in the British Parliament, and sympathized with us throughout that struggle; but were we less at war with England, or she with us, because some of her statesmen and many of her middle classes were with us, believing that we were right and their own country wrong? Would a publicist, dealing with international law, or even municipal law, pretend that you were any the less a nation at war because here and there a man out of office could be found who did not believe that his Government was right? That is not the way that statesmen treat such subjects.

You must take the people of a State as you find them in fact; and if they are rebels, if the State organization has lost its power as a part of the Union, if its old loyal government is rooted up root and branch, and a new government formed on its ruins hostile to the General Government, I say then it is out of the Union to all intents and purposes. Then all is anarchy, except by virtue of their new State organization, which is a treasonable organization; and whether there be more or less of the people who favor it is not a question for statesmen to look to. Statesmen look to the organization, look to those in power, see who the governors are, see who the legislatures are, see who makes the laws. When treason has so triumphed over a State that her governor and her legislative councils are all organs of treason, enacting treason into law, and raising armies for the destruction of the old Government, to tell me that in such a State that government is not displaced is nonsense. If the State is able to maintain its old organization and put down the insurrection, the individuals are guilty of treason, the State standing intact; but when the State organization has yielded to the storm, has ceased all resistance, we have to look upon its people as they are, public enemies, and nothing else.

That, sir, very briefly, is the view I entertain on that subject; but I have said it makes no difference what theoretical view may be taken, for I do not know that anybody supposes that those States are in such a condition that immediately upon the rebellion being quelled they could come right in to Congress and demand participation in the councils of the General Government. If they cannot, it then devolves upon Congress to say how they shall come in, to prescribe the rule, and to define upon what conditions they shall be permitted to come back. Therefore, whether you call them outside of the Union or inside makes very little difference; they are helpless; they are conquered; they are incapable of any act of their own. That would bring us to consider what is their temper and disposition now. Is it such that, according to the great principles of human action and human experience, it is safe to permit them to come into the councils of the nation on an equal footing with the old members of the Republic that have stood by your old flag throughout? That is the result to which I wish to come. I would not legislate on any vindictive principle any quicker than these gentlemen, and I am willing to consign the past to oblivion if it can be done. You must judge of the characters of men by what they have done heretofore. Did ever a nation on the face of the earth which had been so merciful as to save the lives of traitors that sought to destroy it, on the very next day after wrenching the arms out of their hands, invite them into its councils to participate in its deliberations? Would a man who was not utterly insane advocate any such thing? Will you intrust the burglar with your keys? Surely nobody will advocate that. The Senator from Wisconsin himself would not admit that these States may come here at once and thrust their representatives upon us without inquiry on our part.

I hardly supposed that it was necessary to raise a committee to inquire into this subject, all-important as it is. I supposed that every man who had arrived at an age which enabled him to be qualified for a seat in the Senate would have had sufficient human experience to know that a whole nation of traitors of the most vindictive character that were ever heard of on the face of God's earth, men who had resorted to most baleful atrocities against our people, would not on the next day after their arms had been wrenched out of their hands against their will, be in a temper and disposition to participate in the old Government which they had been for years endeavoring with their lives to overthrow, and were invoking European despotisms to aid and assist them in overthrowing. Is that human experience? Are your penal laws enacted with a view to such a trait in human nature? Do men change so quickly? St. Paul himself, as we are informed, was like these men for a time; he breathed fire and destruction against the Christian church, and on his way to Damascus—it is one of the most notable miracles recorded in the Book—he was changed in the twinkling of an eye.

But, sir, you contend for a miracle infinitely greater than that. You contend that a whole nation has changed in one night from the most vindictive enemies to be the fastest friends, with whom it is safe to trust political power. This is the greatest miracle of modern or ancient times, if men believe it. The conversion of St. Paul was a small incident compared to it. Indeed, it does not require a miracle, according to gentlemen's notions, to convert the vilest traitor into a political saint. I want no committee of investigation for such a matter. I know that if I were to enter into it I could produce abundance of evidence showing that their temper is just what might have been expected. I need not, however, go into it. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] some three or four weeks ago, in an elaborate speech, furnished evidence sufficient to show that their fell purpose and intent had not been relinquished one jot or tittle yet. That was unnecessary; it was only what all men would know without any evidence. It is human nature, and if a man is not a judge of that so as to solve such a proposition as this, he does not know enough to be a member of the Senate of the United States.

[Laughter.] Talk not to me of conversions of that kind.

Another gentleman will tell you that very few of the southern men were engaged in the rebellion, that most of them were good Union men who were dragged into this infernal scheme to destroy the best Government in the world, that they perjured themselves and descended to the degradation of human crime. If you could establish such a fact, it would be no compliment to the southern people; it would only show that the great mass of that people are infinitely below the Africans of whom we hear so much. Who dragged the people of the southern States into revolt against their will? Their natural leaders, you say. A people that can be so led are not fit recipients of political power. I will not trust men that can be thus led. When you argue against the intelligence of the African and tell me of his incapacity to exercise the elective franchise for that reason, is not your argument a great deal worse against the whites of the South? Were they dragged and forced into the southern armies and their property sacrificed to carry on a rebellion against their will and desire? Then do not contend for white suffrage.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to inquire how the Senator proposes to extend the right of suffrage to the blacks of the South, whether by legislation or by amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. WADE. I propose to do it upon the same principle that the President assumed to do a great many other things that the Senator thinks and I think were right. I ask how it was that these States were compelled to comply with certain conditions which the Senator says are all-sufficient? Is it not the fact that just before the adjournment of some of the conventions in some of those States telegraphic dispatches were received stating that unless they complied with certain requisitions and adopted the constitutional amendment they would not be admitted into the Union; and did they not thereupon conform their action to the demand made of them? Does the Senator call that voluntary action?

Mr. STEWART. Do not the conditions prescribed by the President stand on a different footing from the right of suffrage? Does not the qualification of voters in a State stand on an entirely different footing from the other propositions as to which the President gave his advice?

Mr. WADE. Not at all, in a constitutional point of view. If you could impose one constitutional amendment upon a State in a matter ordinarily belonging to the State, why not another? They were advised and required by the Executive to pass the constitutional amendment. And, sir, if I was a southern man—for I am very apt to talk frankly—if I were a member of a southern Legislature, and under the duress of a presidential mandate I was forced to comply with any such condition, I would, just as soon as I could, repudiate it on the ground of duress. The mandate of the President to a seceded, fallen State to-day, is nothing more than the command of a robber to a traveler on the highway. They have got to do what is asked of them, and they tell you so, and tell you that when they get freedom of action they will not consider the conditions extorted from them as of any binding force upon them.

Mr. STEWART. The question of suffrage was not, while emancipation was, one of the conditions.

Mr. WADE. Do not understand me now as contending that I am opposed to requiring these conditions of the southern people. I think they were right, but I want them adopted voluntarily and not by coercion or force. That brings me to consider another question which has been greatly overlooked in this argument.

Mr. STEWART. I do not understand the Senator yet as answering my question how the suffrage is to be extended to the blacks. That is a practical question that I desire to have answered.

Mr. WADE. I will tell you before I get through.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear it distinctly.

Mr. WADE. I will tell you exactly how it can be done. It can be done by telling these gentlemen in the southern States, these traitors, that we shall be as lenient to our friends, the Union colored people of the South, as to them; that they shall never put their feet upon this floor until they do justice according to the rule of equity—they who seek justice shall first do justice. There is no difficulty in it, and I was merely endeavoring to show that that position no more transcends the Constitution of the United States than that for which the Senator contends. He says that the President has organized civil governments in the South. Where did he get his constitutional warrant for that? All the great officers of Government are created by law, and the Senate of the United States must participate in their appointment; but the President has appointed civil governors of the States to do civil business. I do not see where he got his warrant to do that if the States had not seceded.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose it was his duty under the war power to provide for the reestablishment of civil government when the armed forces of the rebellion were overthrown. It was undoubtedly his duty then to invite the people to organize.

Mr. WADE. It was his duty under the war power. Would it not have been just as compatible with his duty if he had demanded that civil government be organized by admitting all the colored people of proper age to participate in making the constitution and laws? Would it have been any greater violation of the Constitution than was done? Would it not have been an exercise of military power if he believed it requisite for the public peace? Where is the distinction? No casuist can draw the line of distinction; it is idle to contend for it. Where did he get the power to prescribe the oath which he required these people to take? Do you find that in the Constitution? Where do you find it? Was it not as great a stretch of constitutional power to do that as to say that the colored men should vote?

Mr. STEWART. I think not. I think it very plain that he had no power to interfere with the qualifications of voters in the States. There is no doubt about his power to make such regulations as should secure peace to the inhabitants, and he had a right to invite the citizens who were then acknowledged to be citizens—the constitutional amendment had not then been adopted—to organize civil society.

Mr. WADE. Who are the citizens?

Mr. STEWART. The loyal citizens. He only extended the invitation to loyal citizens.

Mr. WADE. I have no doubt of his power to do it in time of war, but I doubt very much his power to do it in time of peace. This is a time of peace.

Mr. STEWART. What was he to do? Leave them there to anarchy?

Mr. WADE. No, govern them by military power as he had done from the time the war ceased up to the time he prescribed the oath. Why did he prescribe that?

Mr. STEWART. Had not the people a right, with his permission and consent, to organize civil society as soon as they possibly could?

Mr. WADE. No doubt about that; but I do not want to be turned aside to a controversy on that subject. I am not contending that the President has done anything very wrong in all this. I agree that when we conquer a people who had no laws, who had no civil organization and could have none, it devolved upon the President of the United States to keep the peace in that country, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as in his judgment would conduce to that end until such time as Congress should assemble and prescribe the law to be followed. That is what he had a right to do, and in my judgment that is all the Constitution permitted him to do, and in that he had a very large discretion; but I can see no authority for the President to undertake to prescribe an oath which was to qualify persons to elect a State government which was to be the permanent civil government of a State in this Union, a part and parcel of the Union.

I do not know where you find anything in the Constitution of the United States to require that a State shall pass a constitutional amendment of any kind. I do not know how you get it constitutionally. I do know that he could not do it to a State that had not been outside of the Union; no man would attempt it there. There is evidently, therefore, a broad distinction made by the President between a State outside of the Union and a State inside. Neither the President, nor any Senator upon this floor, nor any statesman in the nation, would have thought of prescribing any of these conditions to a State which had never been out of the Union.

Why, then, did the President impose these conditions on the seceded States? Because they are out of the Union, and therefore he was right in demanding conditions. I say he has done well, so far as he has gone. I want him now, as I said before, to put the keystone in the arch; to invoke the loyal people in the South, those who have stood by us through evil report and through good report, whom you can trust, on whom you can rely to-day, to-morrow, and forever, as an offset to the traitors that you propose to let in. I want to counterbalance them, for I dare not trust them alone. I say there is no more constitutional difficulty in the way of accomplishing this result than there is in the way of any condition that the President has enjoined on that people. They all stand upon the same principle precisely; and I wonder that any statesman or lawyer can contend that the President might impose the important radical conditions that he has insisted upon, and rightly insisted upon, as conditions precedent to the organization and admission of these States, and stop there. If he can do what he has done, he can do anything else that is necessary to effect the purpose, to bring these States back into the Union.

There is no great difference in principle between what he has done and what I want him to do. He is right as far as he has gone; and now I want him to make what has been done secure by placing this great question where it must be placed before it will rest in peace, and that is, as I said before, on the rock of eternal justice and truth. I hope the nation will be agitated as by an earthquake until she shall be ready to do right. I know she will finally get down to this rock. You may build upon the sand, but the human mind will not rest upon such a foundation. It never has rested upon it. We have progressed from one point to another until I think we are about stepping upon the rock, and then this controversy will cease and we shall be at rest.

Again, sir, I deny that the organization of these State governments in the South has begun at the right end so far. I contended during the last Congress that the President had no right, by military Order No. 37, or any other military order, to organize a State government anywhere. Our Government must be a Government of the people. In this country you cannot force a Government upon anybody. It might be very convenient if we could. A despotic Government may do it with perfect ease. When Russia conquers Poland she may trample her under foot, because armed with despotic, irresponsible power. When we conquer a people we must deal with them within the pale of the Constitution, in analogy to the great principles of our glorious free Government. If a people conquered by us are so perverse, if they have been educated and stimulated by hate for generations, so that they cannot act with us now, you cannot make republican government out of such material. You are beginning at the wrong end.

Who has asked the President and Congress to establish civil government in the South? How can Democrats contend that a people shall be bound by an organization emanating from the center? That is not the place for it to originate. These people must be held under military subjugation (though an equitable one I would contend for) until they themselves shall see that the time has come when they can act in accordance with the old Constitution and Government of the United States. They have not come to that yet, and nobody is surprised that they have not. Do you suppose that in a moment the temper and disposition of men who breathed fire and wrath against you for four long years, and murdered three hundred thousand of your bravest sons, and committed all the atrocities to which I have alluded, have been so changed that they will ask to be taken back into that Government which they had invoked foreign despotisms to overthrow, and to destroy which they had hazarded their lives and fortunes?

I know that the southern people will come back. I know it is as much for their interest, and infinitely more for their interest, than it is for ours. We all have a pride in the whole nation; as the Senator from Wisconsin said, we will never consent to lose a single star from the old flag; but when we repair this breach, I want it to be done by the people of the South becoming convinced that it is for their interest, and telling us "we are sick of war; we are sick of contending against the power of the United States; and we ask and petition Congress now to permit us to organize a State government in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and we are ready to back up our petition by majorities in the State, uncontrolled by the Army, uninfluenced by anything except the will and wish of the people to get back into the old fold from which they had strayed." I know that they will come in due time, but you cannot force it.

What I wish to inculcate and insist upon is the utter absurdity of supposing that a democratic people can force another people to join them and comply with the forms of the Government when their hearts are at variance with it. The old maxim was that one man could lead a horse to water, but ten men could not make him drink. You cannot make a people drink in democracy until they are ready for it. You may give them the forms, but they are all idle ceremonies unless they are imbued with the spirit. Govern them justly by the strong arm of the nation until such time as they themselves shall have had an opportunity to reflect, to cool off, to become willing that a State government should be revived over them, when they see their interest plainly in that direction. When that is done there is no doubt they will come asking to be allowed to have a State government, some sooner, some later.

Time is a great element in all such cases, and he is a most unreasonable man who expects that in the twinkling of an eye you can make a people cordially coöperate in this free Government who the day before were endeavoring to overthrow it; and until the people themselves can agree to it, it is vain and idle, and worse, to contend that you can force them into this Government by this hot-house operation, and induce them to harmonize with you. They will come back in due time no doubt, and no man will rejoice more than I shall when that time shall come; and I can tell you when it will come. Leave them to themselves; do not send your great officers down there to persuade them; do not leave your conqueror with arms in his hands to say to them "Come up and make such and such a constitution, and come into the Union with it." That is not the way; but govern them equitably until it is shown by their petitions, by their speeches, by their actions, which nobody can mistake, that the great heart of that people has relented and repented of the crimes they have committed, and that they are willing and anxious to come back to the Union as the ark of their safety, and there lodge and travel and act with us.

Sir, I shall look as anxiously as any other man to see that there is this repentance, this temper and disposition that will enable us when they ask it to say to them, "You shall have the right hand of fellowship, you shall stand on as high ground as you ever stood on before;" but I can never consent that a government shall be organized from this central point to bring States into the Union. You can bring them in by the Army of the United States; you can force them to go through the form of making a State government and send their delegates here; but would that be a republican government? Would it be a democracy? Would it be a government having its authority in the consent of the people, such as our great Declaration of Independence calls for?

Mr. President, the great panacea for all our difficulties is to throw our prejudices to the winds and come up and do justice. Look at your old Declaration of Independence; a document which has not its equal; a document which in sublimity, in usefulness, and in enlightenment to the human mind, excels any that has ever been promulgated among men. I am amazed that nearly a century has gone by since that great Declaration was given to mankind, and yet the mass of our Senators have not reached the sublime position in which our forefathers in that darker period stood. They knew full well that the Government they were founding could rest upon nothing else than the great basis of eternal, equal right and justice. I revere that Declaration because it came from their hands, but I revere it more because I know that it came from the hand of the Almighty. It is the will of God that no nation can prosper or rest in peace until it builds upon this foundation. I am for giving all the rights guaranteed in that Declaration to all men, and especially to those who aided me in trouble, who aided me in securing to myself and posterity those great rights that we had all inherited, when they were placed in jeopardy by the accursed traitors whom you look upon with such lenity.

I do not wish to say much in answer to what has been said about the pardoning of rebels. That system of pardoning does not meet my approbation to the extent that it has gone. I never would pardon the wretch who, after having taken an oath to support the Government of the United States which educated him and gave him a high and honorable position among his fellows in order that he might stand by the Government in time of trouble, sneaked away and perjured his soul to God and resigned himself to treason. If I spared his life, it would be all he could have at my hands. Invite such a wretch as that into your Government anywhere! Sir, this mawkish tenderness to traitors is treason to the State. To the mass of the people of the South I would, of course, grant an amnesty; but the great leaders of this rebellion who led them on to destruction cannot have my pardon here, and I do not know that they will hereafter. If there is an unpardonable sin, the wretches who stood as the guardians of this great and glorious and equitable nation, and for selfish purposes turned around and sought its destruction, have committed it, and they never should be pardoned.

But, Mr. President, I stand by my friends; I stand by my pledges. The colored population of this country, four millions in number, are not to be ignored by the speeches of gentlemen nor the votes of this Senate. If you could do so, you would create another oligarchy; for when you cut off from the right to participate in a free Government four millions of its people, more than one third of the entire population of the seceded States, when you cut them off from this great democratic right, you fix a stigma upon them that cannot be wiped out; it will have a bearing infinitely beyond the influence in the Government that their votes will confer; you will have trampled them under foot forever with the mark of Cain upon them; and that will be your return for their brave and able defense of your institutions in time of peril. Sir, I will stand by them forever. As I have already said, my manhood, my honor, my sense of justice, and my policy as a member of a free Government all conduce to the same end, to make me stand firmly and forever by the rights of these four million people. So far as my voice can go they shall stand upon the same basis that I myself stand on. I despise, with a contempt that I cannot name, the man who will contend for rights for himself that he will not award to everybody else. What I claim for myself or my children, politically, I will award to every member of this Government, and with more scrupulous guardianship to him who is weak and uninfluential than to him who is powerful and able to defend himself.

Sir, these are the sentiments that will govern me. I do not wish to continue these desultory remarks. I thought that the elaborate speeches manufactured upon this subject, and the long orations pronounced over it, without suggesting the clearing of the path from any of the difficulties that must occur to everybody, were calculated rather to mislead than anything else; and hence I wished to point out the difficulties that I have encountered all the while since the discussion has been up. I say once more that whenever the southern States can give me evidence that it is safe to withdraw our troops from that quarter, that they will conform to the principles of the Government, that it will be safe to admit them into our counsels, I shall be first and foremost to go with him who is for letting them in; but, sir, I, for one, will never consent to let unwashed traitors, dyed in the blood of our dearest friends, participate in the councils of the Government that they have endeavored to overthrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the further consideration of this subject and all other orders be postponed, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 60.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will give way for a short time. I wish to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Ohio. I shall not occupy ten minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I supposed that would be the end of it, I would give way; but this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate has been for nearly a week upon your table ready to be acted upon. It is a bill from one of your committees—

Mr. STEWART. What bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau; and a discussion is continued here first upon one—

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw my request, and will make my remarks upon that bill when it is called up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well. I hope that the Senate will sustain the motion that I make, and that when that bill shall be called up they will also sustain the effort I shall make to keep it before the Senate until it shall receive its final action.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO MRS. LINCOLN.

Mr. SUMNER. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I ask leave to introduce a bill of which no previous notice has been given.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. In drawing this bill I have followed precisely the precedent in the case of the widow of John Quincy Adams, and I hope the Senate will consent to allow the bill to be put on its passage.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will it displace the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. SUMNER. No; not at all. I ask that it be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that all letters and packets carried by post to and from Mary Lincoln, widow of the late Abraham Lincoln, shall be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Ohio, and this bill being before the Senate calls up the precise question upon which I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment upon the subject discussed by the Senator from Ohio. Without attempting to make a speech, I wish to remark that here is a practical measure before the Senate for the benefit of the freedman, carrying out the constitutional provision to protect him in his civil rights. I am in favor of this bill. It goes to the utmost extent that I think we are entitled to go under the constitutional amendment. There is another bill introduced by the Senator from Illinois which must go along with it, which provides civil jurisdiction for the protection of the freedman. Under this constitutional amendment we can protect the freedman and accomplish something for his real benefit.

I was accused by the Senator from Ohio of having sympathy for the southern white people. I have never expressed that sympathy in this Hall, but I now confess that I have sympathy for the masses of white people of the South. I have sympathy for the women and children who have been suffering under this tremendous war. I have sympathy even for those who have committed these crimes and made the nation mourn. Our duty to punish criminals does not deny us the right to sympathize. I have sympathy for erring humanity always, on all occasions; and, since I am charged with having sympathy for the South, without ever having expressed it, I take this early opportunity to express it. I have also sympathy for the widows and orphans of the North that have been bereaved by this terrible contest, who are forgotten in our efforts for the negro. I have sympathy for the poor negro who is left in a destitute and helpless condition. I am anxious to enter upon any practical legislation that shall help all classes and all sufferers, without regard to color—the white as well as the black.

So far as this question of negro suffrage is concerned, I say it stands upon a different basis from the other propositions discussed by the gentleman, and the other positions assumed by the President. I do not believe that we must arrive at the conclusion that there must be universal suffrage throughout the South, without regard to color, before we can organize those States. This is the only issue between us now. If this question were out of the way, we could settle everything else in two weeks, at least so far as a portion of the southern States are concerned, and we could receive such southern representatives that are loyal, and none other. As the Senator from Ohio has said, there would be no difficulty in agreeing upon everything else, if it were not for the question of negro suffrage in the South. We may as well meet the issue here and understand each other. This is the issue—the only issue before the country. We all want the Union; we all want the Constitution; we all want to see each State enjoying the blessings of that Union and Constitution alike; but there are some who are determined to sacrifice the Union and the Constitution unless they can achieve the right of suffrage for the negro.

In order to ascertain whether this question stands upon a different basis from the other conditions made by the President in reorganizing the southern States, it is only necessary to ascertain what was the verdict of the war. The President, undoubtedly, under the war power, had a right to demand of the people of the South a compliance with that verdict. It is universally conceded that the conqueror has the right to demand the issue decided in his favor, to claim the verdict for himself upon all the issues of the war. Anything further than that has been always, during all ages, regarded as an outrage against law and humanity. When other conditions have been imposed upon a fallen people, no matter whether it was a domestic or a foreign foe, than those that were involved in the contest; when the conqueror, after he has been victorious, has imposed new conditions and new restrictions because he has the power to do so, it has been charged as cruelty, and it has been universally regarded as unjust. Now, in order to know what the President should do under the war power in making peace, it is necessary for us to determine what the verdict of the war was.

When this war commenced the only issue presented to the country by the leaders of the Union organization was the Union of the States. That was the first step. No other issue was then placed before the country. I, for one, embraced that issue. I did all I could in my humble sphere to encourage and aid in vindicating that issue. The union of the States we resolved must be maintained in its full integrity at all hazards. I advocated from the very first hour the vigorous prosecution of the war, as all loyal men did, under this motto of the Union. We commenced to force the southern people to obey the Constitution. We said they had no right to secede. That was the first proposition.

In the progress of the war it was ascertained that the negro had become an element of strength to the South; that they were using him as a war power; they were using him in their trenches; they were using him to raise provisions for their army; and it became necessary and proper that that war power should be taken from the South; and President Lincoln, patriotically and properly, thank God, had the boldness to issue his proclamation and strike a blow at that war power. We then declared, and the nation's honor was then pledged, that we would maintain for the negro his freedom. Then the issue became the Union and the freedom of the negro. These propositions then became involved in the war, the issue that was being tried, and which was to be tested by the result of battle.

Was anything else put in the issue then but the union of the States, submission to the laws, and the abolition of slavery? The war terminated without any new issues that I am aware of being involved in it. Was the issue of negro suffrage ever involved? Was it involved by the emancipation proclamation? Was it involved by any resolution of Congress? Was it involved by the constitutional amendment? If you intended that it should be involved when you passed the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, why did you not incorporate it in that measure?

The South fell; their arms were taken from them; they were compelled to submit to the laws. Then what did President Johnson do? He did what he was bound to do; he carried out, literally, the verdict of the war. He had a right to claim that, because that had been the issue, and it had been decided by a higher tribunal than Congress—the highest tribunal to which man can resort—arms. The verdict was then made, and if he had not carried out that verdict, if he had not demanded everything that was included within that verdict, he would have been recreant to the principles of the Constitution and to his oath of office. How did he find the South? Congress was not in session. He found the South in a condition needing government. He said to them, in effect, "Fellow-citizens, you are conquered; you made several issues with us, and it has been decided that you shall stay in the Union; you must abandon secession forever, for that is the verdict of Congress; that is the verdict of the war; that is the verdict of every instrument of authority under which I act; and under my authority to execute the laws, and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, I require of you to repudiate secession."

Was there anything more required? Yes; the President by a proclamation, which proclamation had been sanctioned by Congress, had abolished slavery, the constitutional amendment not having become a law at that time; yet, that was a part of the issue of the war, and consequently he required that they should abolish slavery; and then he said, "I invite you, fellow-citizens, to comply with this verdict; it is plain; the world understands it; organize your State governments and apply to Congress for representation there." Some of those States having complied, perhaps—I am not discussing that question—come here for admission. They are told by members of Congress and Senators—

Mr. WADE. I wish to ask the Senator this question: if it was the verdict of the war that slavery should be abolished, was it not also the verdict, if it was further necessary for the security of the country, that suffrage should be awarded to the colored people that you had set free? Why was not that as much a verdict of the war as the other?

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Ohio assumes that it is necessary for the security of the country that the right of suffrage should be granted to the negro; that the Government cannot be carried on without it. That is an assumption that is hardly warranted. But even if that were true, it would not be as much a verdict of the war as the other.

Mr. WADE. Why not?

Mr. STEWART. Because the other was named; this was not. The other was named in the pleadings upon which we went to trial and fought it out; this is an issue outside of the pleadings, one that was not named, and consequently not as much a verdict of the war. That is the reason.

But, sir, I contend that it is not necessary to call in the aid of the black man to the government of this country. I do not pretend to say that he shall not at some future time have the right of suffrage under restrictions. But when he shall receive it, it will be for his benefit, not ours. I believe the Anglo-Saxon race can govern this country. I believe it because it has governed it. I believe it because it is the only race that has ever founded such institutions as ours. I believe it because we have a peculiar situation, peculiar education, peculiar qualifications which are not common to other sections or other races of the world. I believe the white man can govern it without the aid of the negro; and I do not believe that it is necessary for the white man that the negro should vote. If he ever does vote, it will be simply as a boon to him. I think we can carry on the Government without him. I think we have had abundant proof of that.

Inasmuch as this was not a part of the verdict of the war; inasmuch as I do not believe it to be necessary for the preservation of the Union, but will endanger our national existence, I am for the Union without negro suffrage, but I am not in favor of turning the negro over to oppression in the South. I am in favor of legislation under the constitutional amendment that shall secure to him a chance to live, a chance to hold property, a chance to be heard in the courts, a chance to enjoy his civil rights, a chance to rise in the scale of humanity, a chance to be a man. I am in favor of this because we are pledged to do it. We have given him freedom, and that implies that he shall have all the civil rights necessary to the enjoyment of that freedom. The Senator from Illinois has introduced two bills, well and carefully prepared, which if passed by Congress will give full and ample protection under the constitutional amendment to the negro in his civil liberty, and guaranty to him civil rights, to which we are pledged.

Sir, we have done something for the negro. The Senator from Ohio says the negro has saved us. Has not the negro had some sacrifices made for him? Was not his liberty a part of the issue involved in this war? Have not hundreds of thousands of white men fallen to vindicate that issue? Do not the desolated homes and orphans and widows throughout the North proclaim the sacrifice that has been made for the negro? Do they not proclaim a sacrifice such as no one race ever made for another before? What race, since the foundation of the earth, ever sacrificed the money, the lives, and the peace of a great country for the elevation of another, as the Americans have done? They have guarantied to him his freedom under the Constitution, and I say it is the part of practical wisdom to pass such bills as are necessary to secure to him his freedom; but if there is a chance to have union, if there is a chance to restore the South, I am not willing to wait until we can tear down the State governments that have been built up during the last summer in the South, until we can revolutionize things again, for the purpose of giving the negro the right of suffrage.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator to say that we have sacrificed these hundreds of thousands of lives in order to give freedom to the negro?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; as one of the issues. The issue was the Union and the abolition of slavery. At first, it was the Union, but subsequently the other question was added to the issue. The pleadings were amended after the war commenced.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say right here that I dissent entirely from the proposition that we have sacrificed a life for that purpose or for that end. On the contrary, I say that we have called nearly two hundred thousand of these black men to the field to fight for our liberty. How much we are indebted to their efforts for those liberties I do not now pretend to measure; but that is the fact.

Mr. STEWART. Then there has been nothing done for the negro; four million slaves have not been emancipated; he has not been benefited by us; all our boast of success is a farce; we have made no sacrifices for the negro; we have not incumbered the Treasury within the last year with millions upon millions of dollars to support a Freedmen's Bureau for the negro! Sir, I say that we have done something for him, and I am in favor of doing more for him.

Mr. HOWE. Let my friend and myself have a perfect understanding with each other. I am inclined to think something has been done for the negro; I hope something has been done for him—not at our hands. The historical fact is—and I really hope my friend from Nevada, who has been with us in all this struggle, will not attempt to dodge that historical fact—that a flagrant war was waged against the supremacy of the United States. The supremacy of the people of the United States was attacked in that war, was assaulted by it. We fought the war for about two years without the slightest demonstration of doing anything for the negro. We finally found, as the Senator just now recited, that we were stronger in this contest by proclaiming liberty to the negro than we were without making any such proclamation, and that to strengthen ourselves, not to increase our sacrifices, the proclamation was induced; and that which we did for our own sake ought not to be charged now to the account of the freedmen by any manner of means. It was to save our own imperiled lives, our own imperiled national existence, and only for that purpose, that the late President of the United States was induced to issue that proclamation, and, as the Senator himself says, to make us stronger, not weaker, to make our sacrifices less, not greater.

Mr. STEWART. I admit, and have not denied, that our interest and our safety consisted in using or wrenching from the South this war power that they were using, whether it consisted of negroes or horses. I admit that it helped us, but I still contend that it helped him also and made him a free man. I still contend that a great deal of expense has already been incurred for his benefit; that a large standing army is now kept up to protect him. He is, and ever has been, unable to protect himself, and it is a slander upon our white soldiers to say that the negro saved the Union. I repeat, I am willing to do all that we have pledged ourselves to do, but I am not willing to reduce the southern States to a territorial condition and hold them for all time, or for any definite time, in that condition, for the purpose of conferring suffrage upon the negro, which was not one of the avowed issues of this war.

I believe that if we were to reduce the southern States to a territorial condition, and hold them in that condition for the space of five years, it would not only destroy our form of government, but deprive us of our own liberties. I believe we can have the Union. I believe we can have it soon. We have got to trust somebody. I say we have got to trust the white people of the South. We cannot organize a government solely upon the negro population. There are seven million white people in the South. The time for exterminating them has passed.

They are in the country. We did not exterminate them during the war. They are there, and are to remain there. If they are to be our enemies, and we attempt to hold them as vassals, it will necessitate the maintaining of a large military force that will endanger our own liberties. Not only that, but it will place in the hands of the Executive powers that will crush Congress and the liberties of the people; and not only that, but it will continue to engender among the people of the South additional hatred, and they will only wait the time when a foreign Power shall help them to rebel again.

And here let me remark that I was astonished to hear Senators upon this floor intimate that we were in a condition to enter upon a foreign war. With seven million people whom we declare are our enemies, whom we declare we cannot trust in our borders, are we prepared to invite a foreign war? I tell you, sir, we had better secure this Union before we talk of a war either with Great Britain or France. The enmity of seven million people constantly among us, and whom we must control, is a dangerous thing. Do you think, if you will not grant them the protection of the Constitution, but hold them as vassals until they carry out any political idea that you can conceive of, that when another trouble shall arise you can get the unnumbered hosts of the loyal men in the North to come forward and again march over that vast country and endure again the terrible horrors of another war, for what? For the sake of governing eleven States as conquered provinces? Do you think if you had avowed that negro suffrage was your ultimatum, that you knew the States were not in the Union, that your purpose was not to keep them in the Union, but to govern them as Territories, that you could have drawn the loyal masses of the North to this terrible conflict? Show me the platforms upon which this fight was made, show me the resolutions of Congress, show me the declarations that put in issue the question of negro suffrage which is now delaying peace and disturbing the country. But gentlemen say we must use military force or negro suffrage. I deny that negro suffrage will render military unnecessary, for the exercise of that right by the negro can only be secured by the national arms, and we must in that event either exterminate the whites or allow them to exterminate the blacks. But the country is sick of war; humanity shudders at the near prospect of more slaughter. Let no mere theory of the equality of races deprive us of peace and union.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the bill by striking out the whole of the fifth section, in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the possessory titles granted in pursuance of Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed and made valid.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possessions for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in, or ousted from, said possession during the said three years unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. GRIMES. I presume the Senator is not going to press that amendment to a vote tonight.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to state what it is. I presume there will be no objection to the amendment. The bill, as it was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, provided for confirming the possessory titles granted in pursuance of General Sherman's order, without stating what those titles were. At the time the bill was reported, it was supposed that those titles had been originally granted for the period of three years, but I have since ascertained that they were granted without limitation, very much in the language of the order. It will be recollected that Major General Sherman in his order stated that certain lands would be set apart for the benefit of the freedmen, and that a general officer would be detailed to give them a possessory title in writing. The order states that the titles were to be possessory only, and that the military authorities would protect the occupants in their possession until Congress should determine in regard to the titles. About one year has expired since these titles were granted. There are some forty or fifty thousand negroes upon these lands, who have been upon them for something like a year. The committee propose to confirm them in these possessions for the period of three years from the time they took possession, thinking that they had a sort of equitable title to the occupation of the lands for a year, and that it would be unjust to turn them off at once. The owners of these lands had abandoned them and were fighting against the Government at the time this order was made. Major General Sherman when he arrived at Savannah found a large number of these persons flocking around his camp whom he had to support out of his commissary stores; he found these lands abandoned by their owners, who were marshaled against us in the rebel army; and he directed these persons, whom he was feeding and who were flocking around his army, to go upon these lands, and promised them protection in the possessions which should be set apart for them. They went there and took possession, and now we propose to protect them in that possession for the period of three years from the date of the order.

Mr. HOWARD. I listened to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, in stating the contents of General Sherman's order, but I beg to inquire of that honorable Senator, what is the reason for this interference with the order of General Sherman? If I understand his statement rightly, that order confers upon the occupants of the land a right to possess and enjoy it during their lives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator misunderstood me. They had no right except the possessory one taken by the Army. They are liable to be turned out by the owners, and we desire to protect them for three years from the time they took possession.

Mr. HOWARD. Liable to be turned out of possession by the owners of the land on their return?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; and they are returning now and pressing to turn these men off from these lands. The committee thought that, having been put there by competent authority, and having occupied the lands and made some improvements, it was nothing more than equitable and just to protect them there during three years unless they sooner give up possession by an arrangement to be made with the former owner, with the approval of the Commissioner of the bureau.

Mr. HOWARD. I was simply anxious to ascertain the full effect of General Sherman's order.

Mr. CLARK. I will state one thing further for the information of the Senator from Michigan and other Senators. Under this order of General Sherman some of these freedmen were put in possession, but no writing, as contemplated by the order, was given them. They are there without a shadow of title; so that if one of the former owners should come back and bring a suit against one of these freedmen, for possession of the land, he must have it, and the freedman is not protected at all.

Mr. SUMNER. As allusion has been made to the order of General Sherman, I have a copy of it in my hand and I will read a sentence which bears on the point to which the Senator from Michigan called attention. The order in that respect is as follows:

"In order to carry out this system of settlement, a general officer will be detailed as inspector of settlements or plantations, whose duty it shall be to visit the settlements and regulate the police and general management, and who will furnish personally to each head of a family, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a possessory title in writing, giving as near as possible the description of boundaries, and who shall adjust all claims or conflicts that arise under the same, subject to the like approval, treating such titles altogether as possessory."

Now, it will be observed that there is no limitation of time. It is not for three years or for life, but the language is the most general; it is a possessory title. The question may well arise, what is that, for what time, to what extent, and what is its value? Then, in another place, certain other lands were to be given, and it is stated that the parties were to hold them "until such time as they can protect themselves, or until Congress shall regulate their title." In that respect the order seemed to contemplate some action of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have received a communication which shows that these written titles were not given in all cases. It is from General Saxton, in which he says:

"So far as I am informed, the titles are alike, and I find no limits to the time the possessory titles under General Sherman's order were to run. Some informal titles were given. Large numbers of freedmen who were entitled to possessory titles have not received them yet, though from no fault of theirs."

That is the condition in which they are. This is a communication from General Saxton, dated the 14th of January, in answer to an inquiry on that subject.

Mr. SUMNER. Then, I take it, the practical question with us is this: whether we discharge our duties to these people by confirming their titles merely for three years? Is the Senator satisfied with that? Does he think that the public faith of the nation to those people, given under peculiar circumstances by a general in the field, by a military order, for the protection of the country and especially of that neighborhood, is sufficiently maintained by our confirming to them a possessory title for three years? I do not pretend to pronounce an opinion the other way, that it is not; but still, it seems to me that three years is a small allowance of time for that general grant of what is called a possessory title without any limitation of time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In regard to that I will state it is a very difficult matter to deal with. It was the opinion of the committee that this was, perhaps, the most equitable arrangement we could make, and as far as we would be justified in going. It was distinctly understood at the time, and the order so says, that the titles were to be possessory only.

The Senator from Massachusetts will remember that in our legislation we have ourselves fixed three years in some of the laws as the period for which leases of land might be given in that section of the country; and in analogy to that the committee thought it would be perhaps an equitable arrangement to confirm this title for the period of three years, unless by some arrangement to be made with the owners it should be given up; and my hope is that arrangements will be made by which these freedmen will get the title in fee simple to some portion of this land. I believe that a homestead is worth more to these people than almost anything else; that if you will make the negro an independent man he must have a home; that so long as the relation of employer and employé exists between the blacks and the whites, you will necessarily have a dependent population. I think if it were in our power to secure a homestead to every family which has been made free by the constitutional amendment, we would do more for the colored race than by any other act we could do: and I trust that arrangements may be made, inasmuch as they are secured for three years in their possession, during that time by which they will obtain a portion of the land in fee.

I should be glad to go further. I would be glad, if we could, to secure to these people, upon any just principle, the fee of this land; but I do not see with what propriety we could except this particular tract of country out of all the other lands in the South, and appropriate it in fee to these parties. I think, having gone upon the land in good faith under the protection of the Government, we may protect them there for a reasonable time; and the opinion of the committee was that three years would be a reasonable time.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 18, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EMPLOYÉS IN COAST SURVEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1853, a statement showing the number and names of persons employed in the coast survey during the year ending June 30, 1865, their compensation, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FURNITURE OF COMMITTEE-ROOMS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, transmitting, in compliance with the 27th rule, an inventory of all the furniture, &c., in the several committee-rooms and other rooms under his charge; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER announced, as the first business in order, the calling of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

LAND GRANT FOR AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. BIDWELL, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established.

The amendment reported by the committee was to add to the bill the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in extending the provisions of this act to the States lately in rebellion, it shall be on the express condition that no person shall be excluded on account of race or color from the benefits of the school or educational fund arising from the lands thus donated.

Mr. BIDWELL. If there be no objection, as the bill is one of very considerable importance, I would ask its consideration at this time.

There was no objection, and the bill was read at length.

The first section provides that the third clause or sub-section of section five of the act of July 2, 1862, shall be so amended as to read thus:

3. Any State or Territory which may take and claim the benefit of the provisions of this act shall provide, within ten years from July 2, 1862, not less than one college as described in the fourth section of this act, or the grant to such State or Territory shall cease, and said State or Territory shall be bound to pay to the United States the amount received on account of any lands previously sold; but the titles of the purchasers thereof from the State or Territory shall be held valid to all intents and purposes.

The second section provides that any State or Territory shall be entitled to the benefits of the act of July 2, 1862, which shall signify its acceptance thereof by an appropriate act of legislation within five years from the approval of said act.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the first two sections of this bill simply extend the time in which the States which have not availed themselves of the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, can do so. The third section, as you will observe, regulates the provisions as they may be extended to the States that have been in the rebellion. The act of 1862 expressly excludes the States which were in rebellion. Now, this provides that they may have the benefit of the act by accepting it on the express condition that no person shall be excluded on account of race or color.

The whole thing is perfectly plain and simple. The extension of time is very important to those States which have not had the opportunity of availing themselves of the provisions of the act. Indiana is one of those States, as I am informed; and the introducer of the bill in part represents that State. The State of California, for many reasons, has not been able to comply with the act of 1862. One is that there are not lands sufficient within that State surveyed and brought into market, so that she might choose the amount which would be due to her under this act. Another is that the Legislature of the State of California was not in session, the sessions being biennial, so that she could signify at the proper time her acceptance.

An act was passed in 1864 extending the time for two years from April, 1864, and that time has nearly elapsed, so that it will be necessary that a further extension of time should be granted.

I hope the bill will now be considered. I can see no objection to it.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from California will consent to a postponement of this bill, so that it may be printed. There are some important provisions in it, and I would like to see them in print before I am called upon to vote on it.

Mr. HILL. I was about to make the same suggestion to the gentleman from California. The bill involves many important points.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move that its further consideration be postponed till one week from to-day after the morning hour, and that it be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ALMON W. BABBITT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the administrators of the estate of the late Almon W. Babbitt, secretary of Utah; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

GOVERNMENT PILOTS.

Mr. DARLING, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted an adverse report upon the resolution as to the justice and expediency of directing by law that all pilots engaged in the Government service during the late war shall be classed as officers, &c.; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MELCHIOR HUFFNAGLE.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report upon the memorial of Melchior Huffnagle; which was laid upon the table.

THOMAS JENKINS.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the same committee, also submitted an adverse report on the petition of Thomas Jenkins; which he moved be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the same committee, also submitted an adverse report in the case of William Wallace; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MARY M'LAIN.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Mrs. Mary McLain, and called for the reading of the report.

The report was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN SMITH.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the same committee, submitted an adverse report on the petition of John Smith; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REV. ANSON HUBBARD.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Rev. Anson Hubbard, of Chelsea, Massachusetts, praying for a pension; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

HANNAH B. SUMNER.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Hannah B. Sumner, widow of General E. V. Sumner; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTER OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution of January 5, 1865, authorizing the appointment of stenographic reporter, be so modified as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a competent stenographic reporter, to continue in office until otherwise ordered by the House, whose duty it shall be to report, in short hand, on the order of any of the standing or special committees of the House, such proceedings as they may deem necessary; and, when ordered to be printed, properly index and supervise the publication of the same; and who shall receive therefor an annual compensation at the rate now allowed by regulation for reporting court-martial proceedings: Provided, That all such reporting ordered by committees of the House, and all such as he shall be required to do for joint committees, shall be done by said reporter, or persons employed by him, without extra compensation or additional expense.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to modify the resolution so that the matter reported shall be under the entire control of the committees or the House. In explanation I will say this: it sometimes happens that these reports taken by stenographers for committees get published in the newspapers or elsewhere without the knowledge either of the committee or the House. I think, therefore, there should be such a provision as I have suggested.

Mr. ROLLINS. If the gentleman will state the form of his amendment, perhaps I may adopt it.

Mr. DAWES. Merely that the reports so taken shall be under the entire control of the committees or the House.

Mr. ROLLINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAWES. I then move to amend by adding the following:

Provided further, That the reports so taken shall be under the entire control of the committees, respectively, by which such testimony may be taken, or of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] be kind enough to tell us how this whole matter of a stenographer for the House now stands? What pay does he get?

Mr. ROLLINS. On the 5th of January, 1865, a resolution was passed authorizing the Speaker to appoint a stenographic reporter, to be paid the same compensation as is allowed in reporting court-martial proceedings. This was construed to mean ten dollars per day. Consequently the reporter is receiving at the rate of $3,650 per year. The committee, after careful examination of the whole matter, and collecting all the evidence that it was possible to collect, have come to the conclusion that if the stenographic reporter is compelled to report, without additional expense to the Government, all the proceedings of the special and standing committees of the House, and also all that he may be called upon to report for the joint committees of the two Houses, quite a large sum may be saved for the Government; that the amount paid for reporting these various proceedings under the salary now allowed to the reporter will be not so much as has heretofore been paid. I have the figures here, and shall be glad to submit them to the House, if gentlemen desire.

Mr. CONKLING. Are we right in understanding the gentleman to say that ten dollars is paid for every day in the year, whether reporting is done or not?

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is so. The resolution of the House gives to the reporter ten dollars per day, whether he does anything or not—$3,650 a year.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to inquire whether, if this resolution is adopted, the stenographer to be appointed is to do or has done at his own expense all the reporting of any sort that may be necessary for special and standing committees?

Mr. ROLLINS. If the gentlemen had listened to the reading of the proviso to the resolution he would have seen that the reporter must report all the proceedings of standing and special committees, and also of joint committees that he may be called upon to report.

Mr. CONKLING. I did listen to it, and I do understand it, and yet I want to know from the better information of the gentleman whether really we can rely upon the expectation that any stenographer, receiving even $3,650 a year, will, without further appropriation or compensation, provide for all the stenographic reporting which is to be done during any session of Congress, for it seems to me that enough reporting of that sort is certain to be required at this session of Congress to very greatly exceed the amount which the gentleman fixes. If this resolution be adopted, whenever an extraordinary quantity of reporting shall be necessary, application will be made, and perhaps made so meritoriously that it will be allowed, for extra compensation to be given on account of the extraordinary amount of service rendered. If that is not so, and if this is really the be-all and the end-all of the matter, I am willing, for one, to vote for the resolution.

Mr. ROLLINS. All I can say about it is, that the committee design that this shall be the be-all and the end-all of the matter.

Mr. HALE. A resolution was adopted by the House a few days or a few weeks ago, calling upon the Committee of Accounts to report upon certain specific matters designated therein. I would inquire of the gentleman from New Hampshire whether the report which he now makes embraces the answer to that resolution?

Mr. ROLLINS. It was so intended. If the gentleman from New York desires further information, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read the evidence that was submitted to the committee. In the first place, I will ask for the reading of a letter from the Clerk of the House.

Mr. HALE. I want merely the conclusion of the committee.

Mr. ROLLINS. The first paper I will have read is a brief note from the Clerk of the House, showing the amount paid from the contingent fund of the House only.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES. WASHINGTON, D. C., January 15, 1866.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the Committee of Accounts asking for information as to the amount of money paid during the Thirty-Seventh and first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, for reporting proceedings before the standing and special committees of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to submit the following statement from the books of this office, which embraces all moneys so paid to committees of the House proper. I have reason to believe there were some payments made for reporting proceedings of joint committees, but not having access to the proper source of information as to such payments I am unable to give the amount:

Thirty-Seventh Congress.		Reporting.
1038. J. J. McElhone.....		$358 88
1543. J. J. McElhone.....		253 50
2356. Theodore T. Andrews.....		262 28
2360. J. J. McElhone.....		214 00
2361. H. G. Hayes.....		150 00
		$1,348 64

Thirty-Eighth Congress. First Session.		Reporting.
476. Theodore T. Andrews.....		$135 00
737. Theodore T. Andrews.....		785 52
738. Theodore T. Andrews.....		630 00
799. J. J. McElhone.....		553 50
		$2,104 02

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

CLINTON LLOYD.

Chief Clerk House of Representatives.
Hon. E. H. ROLLINS,
Chairman of Committee of Accounts.

Mr. ROLLINS. That was the amount paid from the contingent fund of the House. I now ask attention to the following figures, which were brought before the committee:

Cost of reporting House and joint committees under old system during three previous sessions.

FIRST SESSION THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Conduct of the war.....	$1,885 00
Special committee relative to Hon. F. P. Blair.....	135 00
Special committee relative to currency printing.....	630 00
Committee on Naval Affairs.....	533 00
Committee on Public Expenditures.....	785 00
Committee on Public Expenditures.....	499 50
	$4,487 50

THIRD SESSION THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

Conduct of the war.....	$3,240 50
Patent Office investigation.....	214 00
Hon. Mr. Ashley.....	150 00
Jay Cooke & Co.....	40 00
	$3,644 50

SECOND SESSION THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

Conduct of the war.....	$2,565 00
Government contracts.....	5,000 00
Censorship of the press.....	353 88
Conduct of Hon. Benjamin Wood.....	263 00
Charles Henry Foster.....	24 75
	$8,211 63

Committee proceedings reported by stenographer to committees during last half of last session, and amounts under old rates of pay:

Committee on Commerce, (Joint,) investigating trade with rebel States.....	$700 00
Committee on Military Affairs, investigating Old Capitol prison.....	500 00
Committee for the District of Columbia, investigating enlistments in the District Jail.....	100 00
Committee, special, (Joint,) investigating ventilation of Halls of Congress.....	200 00
Committee, special, investigating Patent Office affairs.....	200 00
Committee, special, investigating assault on Hon. Mr. Kelley.....	100 00
	$1,800 00

In justice to the reporter, I will state that the proceedings reported for committees by him, during the last session, from the 5th of January to the 6th of March amounted in the aggregate to $1,800 worth at the old rates.

Now, I will listen to anything that gentlemen desire to say.

Mr. HALE. The resolution under which this stenographic reporter was appointed passed in January, 1865, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the peculiar language of that resolution. I do it for the reason that I think it is, upon its face, exceedingly blind and uncertain, and for the further reason that I am assured by gentlemen upon this floor that they voted for the resolution under the idea that the compensation was to be an entirely different one from that which has been practically allowed. The resolution was as follows:

"Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a competent stenographic reporter, to continue in office until otherwise ordered by the House, whose duty it shall be to report in short-hand, on the order of any of the standing or special committees of the House, such proceedings as they may deem necessary, and when ordered to be printed, properly index and supervise the publication of the same, and who shall receive therefor an annual compensation at the rate now allowed by regulation for reporting court-martial proceedings."

I understand that the rate allowed by law for reporting court-martial proceedings is ten dollars a day for actual services.

I understand from gentlemen on the floor of this House who voted for this resolution, that when they voted they supposed that was to be the rule for compensation here, ten dollars a day for actual services. I understand that the reporter appointed by the Speaker under this resolution—appointed January 5, Congress closing its session on the 3d of March following—could only have spent some sixty days in service; and for those sixty days' services, or so much as was necessary for him to perform those duties, he has been allowed ten dollars a day for the entire year. Now, I do not believe that that rule of compensation was ever intended to be adopted by this House, or is one which this House is now disposed to sustain.

More than that, it strikes me that the proposition submitted by the Committee of Accounts fails to reach the evil. They propose, not to do away with this false and unjust rule of compensation, nor to decrease it or limit it in any degree, but to recognize it, coupling with it a provision that certain work in bulk shall be done by this reporter. Now, we all know what will be the effect of such a resolution. It will be to give this reporter his ten dollars a day for the entire year, whether he do much or little; and we all know that when he is called upon to perform services, the compensation for which at ordinary rates will amount to anything like the amount reported by the Committee of Accounts as having been paid for services heretofore, some eight thousand dollars a year, we will be met at the close of the session with a proposition for the allowance of extra compensation, and it is perfectly certain that some way will be found to get it through. In other words, by the amendment proposed to the original resolution by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] the reporter will continue to draw the compensation which he is now allowed, and which is out of proportion to the duties which he has performed, and it seems to me it leaves the House open to a claim from him for extra compensation.

Mr. CONKLING. I would ask my colleague [Mr. HALE] if a bond were required of the reporter for the performance of this duty, the bond to be properly conditioned, would it obviate the difficulty he suggests?

Mr. HALE. In my judgment it would certainly be an improvement; but I still think it would leave the matter on a wrong basis. I think we ought to employ reporters, when the services of any may be needed, at a fair compensation for the services they may perform, and not vote a round sum, in bulk, for services which they may or may not perform.

Mr. ROLLINS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] that the very course which he now proposes for us to follow has been the very course followed in the past; and after a most careful, thorough, and scrutinizing examination of this whole matter, the Committee of Accounts have come to the conclusion that the Government can save several thousand dollars per annum by adopting the resolution proposed by the committee. I do not believe there was any disposition on the part of the Committee of Accounts—I know there was not—to continue this office one single day unless it was for the interest of the Government. I say to the gentleman that at the outset I thought it would be best to abolish the office. I commenced the examination with the expectation of arriving at that conclusion; but after a careful examination I changed my opinion, and the committee have unanimously reported this resolution, for we believe that by doing so money may be saved to the Government. We believe it is a matter of economy to pass this resolution; and we believe that the gentleman who is now performing the duties provided for by the resolution of last session will perform those duties in accordance with the proviso added to the resolution, and in good faith; and I have no doubt he will be willing to furnish a bond to this House to that effect.

If those who succeed to our places here shall hereafter see fit to give additional compensation to whoever may discharge these duties, I do not know how we can bind them by any action we may take. They can do as they please. I do not expect that any resolution we may pass here will in any way bind any future House. And if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] expects to accomplish any such result as that, I apprehend he will be entirely mistaken; he will not accomplish his object. I will state that our design is only to do what to us seems best to save money to the Government, and we believe the passage of this resolution will accomplish that object. I now move the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I by no means design to impute any improper motives to the action of the committee, and I hope the gentleman does not so understand me. Neither do I propose, by a resolution, to attempt to bind any future House, or to bind this House in its future action. I concede the impossibility of doing that. But the true remedy in this case is to repeal this resolution of January, 1865, and in place of it adopt a provision for the appointment of reporters of committees, if necessary, at a fair compensation, to be determined by actual service. And if the gentleman will allow me to move such an amendment in order to take the sense of the House upon it, I will do so.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to say one word more in justice to the reporter. At the last session of Congress the amount reported by him, according to the rates formerly paid, would have required the payment of $1,800. And he was obliged to pay from his own purse a large sum for reporting committees, when it was impossible for him to do the work, in consequence of several committees sitting at the same time. And if this resolution should be adopted, he will be obliged in future, when two or more committees are sitting at the same time, to employ outside help. And I think if he pays from his own purse the money necessary to compensate those additional reporters, the compensation of ten dollars a day, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] deems so exorbitant, will not be unreasonably large.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire yield to me for one moment?

Mr. ROLLINS. I will.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to say only one word in regard to this matter. I knew something in regard to the introduction and passage of this resolution at the last session; and I knew the reasons which controlled the House at that time—reasons which I fully approve—first, on the score of economy, and second, on the score of convenience, by having a competent reporter at all times responsible to the House, and at all times ready to perform the duties which may be required of him. These were the reasons for the introduction and passage of that resolution. I think it has been shown—I was not here when the gentleman from New Hampshire commenced his speech, but if he has not shown it, I can show it—that it is absolutely a matter of economy to adhere to the resolution of the last session, with the explanatory amendment now proposed by the Committee of Accounts. I am informed that the figures in relation to this subject have been read to the House; and if those figures do not lie, they show that the system adopted by the House in the resolution of the last session has resulted in a large saving of money, as compared with the system previously pursued.

Now, sir, we have a reporter, a man who is fully competent for the duties of his position; and if this Congress shall have occasion for anything like the amount of reporting which was done for the last Congress, then, by adopting the resolution proposed by the Committee of Accounts, instead of picking up reporters, as we formerly did, at the usual compensation, we shall save probably three or four thousand dollars during this very session. If the House should now dispense with this reporter, who is now engaged in reporting for one of the committees, the joint committee on reconstruction, we shall have to employ another reporter at the ordinary compensation; and if we take a large amount of testimony—as we may or may not; I say nothing about that—it will amount to a much larger sum than that which we would pay to the regular reporter now employed under the resolution of the last session.

Hence, by these two considerations—first, on the score of economy, saving, as I think, a large amount of money to the Government, and second, the advantage of having a reporter who is an officer of the House, a competent and responsible man, who can be called upon at all times to do this work for the committees—I am induced to support the resolution now submitted by the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment submitted by Mr. DAWES was adopted.

The question then recurring on agreeing to the resolution as amended, there were, on a division—ayes 76, noes 80.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. JENCKES, from the select committee on the bankrupt law, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 7) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and moved that the bill with the amendments be printed and made the special order for Tuesday, the 80th instant, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES also, from the same committee, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, reported by the committee on that subject, be printed for the use of this House.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 83) to extend the time for completing certain land-grant railroads in the States therein named; and Joint resolution (S. No. 17) directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT. From the select committee on freedmen I report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 87) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees."

I move that the bill and amendments be postponed until Tuesday next after the morning hour, and made the special order for that day and until disposed of, and that they be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DAMAGES IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, submitted a report, which was read, as follows:

The Committee of Claims ask leave to make the following report:

The attention of the House is called to the large number of claims from citizens of States lately in rebellion, growing out of the destruction of, or damage to, property by the Army or Navy while engaged in suppressing the insurrection.

The committee are impressed with the necessity of establishing a rule, by the House, which shall guide them in deliberating upon this class of claims. The number of cases from this source is so great as to render it hardly possible for the committee to examine the particulars of each one with the care and scrutiny necessary to prevent fraud and imposition against the Government, provided there be sufficient grounds to demand the favorable attention of Congress. The dimensions and duration of the war, and the persistence with which the rebellion was maintained, rendered it necessary for the Army of the loyal Government to make large destructions of property, and also to make use of considerable property in States in rebellion for necessary supplies and subsistence. This destruction and appropriation was a military necessity, imposed upon the Government, in order to put down rebellion and to save the life of the nation.

The committee are unable to give the House any definite information as to the quantity or value of the property thus destroyed or appropriated; but it is suggested that an attempt to indemnify and compensate this numerous class of claimants will require an amount of appropriations much greater than the revenues of the nation at this time can possibly satisfy.

It seems to the committee, therefore, that the House should determine, by its action, whether these claims should be assumed, whereby the national debt must be increased to an indefinite extent.

The previous action of Congress and of the various committees, who, from time to time, have had this subject under consideration, does not, in our opinion, establish such principles nor furnish such precedents as are necessary for the government of the committee in making recommendations under the new and important circumstances now surrounding the question. Heretofore the amount of claims at any time resting upon the Government for such losses has been limited so as not to exceed the resources of the Government under reasonable and permissible taxation, and hence a disposition has often been exhibited by both Congress and the various Committees of Claims to equalize burdens and losses by paying such demands. But this disposition has not uniformly existed, and many instances of the rejection of such claims is found in the history of the legislation of the Government. The persistence, however, with which claimants have renewed their applications when rejected has frequently enabled them to finally succeed, and often under circumstances which render their success of doubtful propriety. Appeals to our sympathy, humanity, and benevolence are not easily resisted, and it is a credit to human nature that we are so constituted as to be accessible to such appeals. It is to be remembered, however, that such appeals ought not to induce and cannot authorize us to levy extraordinary taxation upon our constituents in order to gratify our charitable impulses. We are not almoners, merely, for the nation, and have no just right to impose increased taxation in order to gratify our feelings of benevolence, nor to establish principles of abstract justice and equity when there is no rule or law requiring it, and particularly when the attempt is to be attended with great uncertainty and be subjected to innumerable impositions and frauds.

Neither does the committee find any very well settled principles, in regard to a nation's liability to pay for this class of losses, laid down by the commentators on national law. Where the claimants are of undoubted loyalty and the damage has resulted from the appropriation of private property for the use of the Government, or by way of precaution, in order to repel the enemy, it is the opinion of Vattel that the damages should be paid. But for other damages caused by inevitable necessity that writer says:

"They are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall. The sovereign, indeed, ought to show an equitable regard for the sufferers, if the situation of his affairs will admit it, but no action lies against the State for misfortunes of this nature for losses which she has occasioned not willfully but through necessity and by mere accident. The same may be said of damages caused by the enemy. All the subjects are exposed to such damages, and woe to him on whom they fall. The members of a society may well encounter such risks of property since they encounter a similar risk of life itself. Were the State strictly to indemnify all those whose property is injured in this manner, the public finances would soon be exhausted, and every individual in the State would be obliged to contribute his share in due proportion; a thing utterly impracticable. Besides, these indemnifications would be liable to a thousand abuses, and there would be no end of the particulars. It is, therefore, to be presumed that no such thing was ever intended by those who united to form a society."

These remarks are quoted because of their apparent applicability to the question presented. It seems to the committee that the magnitude of the public debt created to suppress the rebellion renders it impossible for the Government to attempt to compensate all those who have sustained individual losses by the action of our Army in the field. The attempt would impair the national credit abroad, destroy confidence in the public securities everywhere, impose such additional burdens of taxation as to give cause for discontent and complaint, and thereby lead to the possible encouragement of such evil-minded persons as may be led to favor the policy of repudiation.

The committee are therefore of the opinion that, in view of the magnitude of these losses, as well as the magnitude of the public debt, and the thousand abuses necessarily resulting from an attempt to satisfy these claims, in the words of Vattel, "the thing is utterly impracticable," and ought not to be encouraged.

It may be suggested that a distinction should be made between losses arising out of the destruction of property incident to the ravages of war and damages growing out of the appropriation of property for the uses of the Army. Without controverting the propriety of this distinction, so far as citizens of the loyal States are concerned, it is suggested that it will be dangerous and inexpedient to apply it to claims coming from States lately in rebellion. It will be difficult to determine, with a sufficient degree of certainty, the question of individual loyalty; and if it be established, as a rule, that property taken from loyal citizens, in rebellious States, for military supplies, shall be paid for, it may be conceded that every claimant will find some proof to present of his devotion and suffering in the cause of the Government. The examinations before a committee are necessarily ex parte, consisting mostly of the affidavits of persons as to whose character for truth and honesty little can be known.

The committee calls the attention of the House to an act of Congress, approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, &c.," which deprived that court of any jurisdiction of claims against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damage to, property by the Army or Navy engaged in the suppression of the rebellion. It was scarcely the policy of this law to transfer the adjudication of this class of claims from the court to Congress, for the second and third sections of the act provide that the claims of loyal citizens, in States not in rebellion, for supplies and subsistence actually furnished the Army, and receipted for, or taken by officers without giving receipts, may be adjusted and allowed by the Quartermaster and Commissary Generals respectively. In the light of this act, it seems to have been the policy of the authors that the claims of loyal citizens in loyal States for supplies to the Army should be paid, and that the Government should not be held liable for any such claim coming from citizens of States in rebellion, nor liable for any claim, coming from any portion of the country, which resulted merely from the ravages of war, at least without an act of Congress for the payment of it.

The committee think that the policy of this act, as they understand it, should be strictly adhered to. That the necessities of the nation demand that we attempt to pay no claim growing out of the destruction of, or damage to, property by the necessities of the war; nor any claim for property furnished to, or taken by, military officers, except as the same is now provided for by the act referred to.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims, referred to them for examination, by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion, growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damage to, property, by the Army or Navy while engaged in suppressing the rebellion.

The SPEAKER stated that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. DELANO moved that the report be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas many American ship-owners, while beligerent rights were accorded by foreign nations to rebel cruisers, in order to protect their vessels from destruction or capture by our enemies, placed them under foreign flags, thereby securing all the advantages incident to such protection in competing with American commerce for the carrying trade of the world; having derived all these advantages by abandoning the flag of their country during a period of war, and identifying their interests with the destroyers of its commerce, they should not be permitted, after the restoration of peace, to reregister their vessels in American ports, as many have done and are now doing, in violation or evasion of the spirit of our navigation laws: Therefore,

Resolved, That all vessels once American, whose national character has been changed, or which have been placed under a foreign flag or a foreign register, should be treated as foreign-built vessels, and should never again be allowed an American register.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House how many and what vessels previously under a foreign register have been allowed to take out American registers since the 31st of December, 1864, with the respective dates of such American registers; and also the authority of law under which such changes of registry have been allowed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a resolution which will give rise to no debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I must decline to yield. I see other gentlemen who will ask for the same thing.

The SPEAKER stated that if objection had not been made by calling for the regular order of business he would have laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to decrease of our mercantile marine, and suggesting such remedial legislation as he may deem expedient, in response to a resolution of the House of February 23, 1865; but as the House would perhaps desire to have the paper read, he would withhold it for the present.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The morning hour having expired, the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; on which Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have no apologies to offer for addressing the House on this subject. As the only Representative upon this floor of a State whose whole history has been a continual protest against political injustice and wrong, it is my duty, as it is my pleasure, to express by voice and vote my approval of the principles involved in the bill now before the House. No attentive listener to this debate can have failed to perceive the absolute paucity of reasoning which has thus far characterized the speeches which have been made in opposition to this measure. I find it difficult to sift from the mass of verbiage with which they abound the few points on which their arguments turn. I state them as briefly as possible.

It is said, in the first place, that the people of this District have shown by a large majority that they do not desire impartial manhood suffrage.

The right of Congress, and not the people of this District, to settle this matter, is clear and undoubted, and is acknowledged by those who oppose this bill. For my own part, I consider the possession of this right a sufficient reason for its exercise; the act being in itself just, wise, and necessary, and dictated by the highest and best principles of governmental policy. It is not for the people of this District, especially that portion of them who voted at the late pretended election, to authorize the continued disfranchisement of any class in their midst. "Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." This principle is sufficient to base an all-conclusive answer to this the first reason given against this measure of justice.

We are told, again, that the people to be enfranchised are poor, ignorant, and incapable of enjoying the rights of citizenship.

A renewed recital of the statistics of their condition in this District is an ample answer to all this.

The colored people in this District, numbering about twenty thousand, own twenty-one churches, the maintenance of which costs annually $20,000. They support thirty-three day schools, and pay taxes on one and a quarter million dollars' worth of real property. Three thousand and odd have served in the Army of the Union, of whom one thousand have fallen in battle and by disease in defense of the country. They have over four thousand church members. In twenty-two Sunday schools they have over three thousand scholars. Their property is taxed to aid in the education of the white children, while they support their own schools. The report of the superintendent of colored schools for the month of December shows an attendance at forty-five schools of five thousand six hundred and eighteen pupils. Nine other schools, having in November five hundred and sixty pupils, are not included in this report. There are two excellent industrial schools, with one hundred and forty-seven pupils. Not one of these schools is sustained by the municipal authorities of either Washington or Georgetown. They are supported by benevolent organizations. In addition, there are the schools under the Freedmen's Commission, which have a large number of pupils.

They take over four thousand copies of the two Republican papers of this District, and, be it said to their credit, not many subscribers can be found among them for the organs of caste and prejudice. This oppressed and injured race, who are so poor and ignorant as to be incapable, in the judgment of gentlemen on the other side of the House, of voting intelligently, support thirty "benevolent, literary, and civic organizations," which contribute to their intelligence, and care for their poor and needy.

The city supports but few colored paupers. They will show as large a proportion of children growing up with education as any other laboring community can. Sir, it is not too much to say that the colored people of this District show as good tests of intelligence, so far as that can be seen by the proportion of education among them, the amount of religious character, the quality of industry, freedom from poverty, payment of taxes, and loyalty as evinced by military service, as can be found in the constituencies of gentlemen speaking in opposition to this bill.

The only reply made to all these proofs of character, industry, and intelligence is, that "this is a white man's Government." The Constitution is fiercely invoked to sustain this dogma, while the mutilation of historical evidence is as complete as political deception can devise.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud enough of my race, its progress, its condition, and its achievements. I am too proud, sir, to fear the competition of the swarthy scions of another and unfortunate one. I do not share in the solicitude which seems to torture the minds of the opponents of this bill, as they dwell with words of horror and alarm on the prospect of competition between the constituencies they represent and the colored people of this District, just emerging into the full rights of American citizenship. My pride in the white race leads me to honor Sir Philip Sidney, when he declared—

"That the poorer and more degraded a human being, the nearer he comes to the sympathy of a true gentleman."

And I honor, too, the jurist—I think it was Judge Harrington, of Vermont—who would not acknowledge a man to be a slave unless a bill of sale from God was shown him. I am proud of my race when I remember the motive that dictated Jefferson's testimony when he declared that "he trembled for his country when he remembered that God was just." I am so sure of the supremacy of my race, that I cannot acknowledge want of capacity for competition, as inferred from the arguments of the Opposition, when they plead for laws excluding a portion of the loyal people of this District from an "equal chance in the race of life." Nor have I any fear of social equality or of a social revolution because we give to the poor and the unfortunate the right of political self-defense.

But "this is a white man's Government," say the authoritative representatives of the Democratic party of the country again and again. I shall endeavor to show as compactly as I can the utter falsity of the declaration as taken in the sense used by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I shall show that by all the methods in which association with and service for this Union is recognized the American colored man has always been included within the term "people," and been esteemed a citizen of the Republic. Let us see from the records of history how far the facts assure the truth of this assertion. The Constitution of the United States does not deny this. The Articles forming the original Confederation include no provision setting forth such a limitation. The Declaration is explicit, and directly in opposition to this dogma. A majority of the original State constitutions list no syllable sustaining it. All the declarations, sentiments, and writings of the leading men of the Revolution breathe a spirit to the contrary of this proscriptive heresy. Now, sir, to the proof. It is asserted that the term "people" did not include free colored persons.

On the 25th of June, 1778, the Continental Congress decided that the word "white" should not be included in the fourth article. This provides that the "free inhabitants of each of the States (paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted) shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." South Carolina moved to insert the word "white." Eleven States voted: two sustained the motion; one was divided; eight States voted against it. Thus the fathers affirmed the right of the free colored man to vote and share the Government with the free whites. Another and similar proposition was also rejected.

This same Congress twice passed laws for the government of territory ceded to the United States by the several States. These were the acts of April 23, 1784, for the government of such territory, and of July 13, 1787, for the government of what was known as the "North-west Territory." In neither of these acts was the right of suffrage restricted to white persons. On the contrary, the discussion at the time of adoption was explicit upon that question. Sir, it is surprising that at this late day, when all the facts bearing upon this question have been so thoroughly sifted, and never successfully controverted, anybody can be found who will deny that free persons of color participated equally with the whites in the organization of the Government; in voting upon all measures establishing the Confederation; in the adoption of the present Constitution; and that in a majority of the States forming the Union they exercised the elective franchise.

The constitution of Massachusetts provides that every male person twenty-one years of age, residing one year in the town, and owning a freehold valued at three pounds, or an estate of the value of sixty pounds, should have the right to vote.

Rhode Island, by its colonial charter, provides that members of her General Assembly should be elected by "the major portion of the freemen of the respective towns or places."

Connecticut provided only that forty shillings freehold, or personal estate valued at forty pounds, "with mature years and civil behavior," should be the qualification for electors.

New York gave the franchise to "every male inhabitant" possessing certain qualifications, among which color was not enumerated.

New Jersey said, "all inhabitants of the colony of full age" possessing certain qualifications, among which was not mentioned color, should be entitled to vote for all officers elected by the people. The gentleman from New Jersey knows well that under this provision free men of color voted in that State for many years.

Pennsylvania said, "all freemen" of the age of twenty-one, who had resided one year in the State and paid taxes, should be entitled to vote. Not white men, but "all freemen," is the words of the original constitution of that State.

Delaware said in her bill of rights:

"Every freeman having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with and attachment to the community hath the right of suffrage."

This is a declaration amply sufficient to cover every point in the bill we are now discussing. "Having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest." Will any candid man deny the evidence of this common interest which has been presented here?

Maryland provided that "all freemen" over twenty-one, and possessing a freehold of fifty acres, and having property in the State valued above thirty pounds, should have the right of suffrage.

Virginia made in her bill of rights the same declaration I have quoted from Delaware.

North Carolina gave the right of suffrage to "all freemen" who had resided a certain period in the State and paid taxes.

Georgia made no distinctions of color. That State required for the exercise of the franchise only that the voter should be a free man, be twenty-one years old, have resided and paid taxes in the State for six months preceding the election.

South Carolina alone—from the beginning the marplot of our republican councils—inserted the word "white" after "free" and before "man," in articles fixing qualifications for electors in that State.

With this exception, and those of Virginia and Delaware, though their declaration of rights were broad enough to cover all free persons, the exercise of the right of suffrage was regulated by statutory enactment. All the other States included among their electors free persons of color. In no State constitution, except South Carolina, was it limited by term to the white man. Is that State the model upon which gentlemen desire to mould this nation? Are not the facts thus collated sufficient to refute the assertion that the American colored man had no lot or part in the organization of this Government? If the proofs of the long-continued exercise of the elective franchise, continuing in most of the States during the first forty and best years of the Republic, do not overthrow such baseless assertions, what then will?

But, sir, it is not only the enactments of the Continental Congress, and of the different States which formed this Union, but still more explicitly do the founders of this Republic give back the libel now sought to be fastened upon them. The early pages of our history teem with their declarations, both as individuals and as members of the Government. In 1779 the Continental Congress announced, in a pamphlet ordered to be printed, that—

"The great principle [of government] is and will ever remain in force, that men are by nature free; as accountable to Him that made them, they must be so; and so long as we have any idea of divine justice, we must associate that of human freedom. Whether men can part with their liberty is among the questions which have exercised the ablest minds; but it is conceded on all hands that the right to be free can never be alienated; still less is it practicable for one generation to mortgage the privileges of another."

The entire argument made on the other side of the House is answered, granting that it was true in fact that our fathers did not take measures for the black man's rights equally with their own. One generation cannot make a lien upon my rights, or those of any other man. They cannot mortgage them to the future. When that future comes and opportunity offers to undo the wrong, it is its solemn duty to apply the remedy.

Mr. Jefferson's opinions are well known. Mr. Madison has declared that the word "slave" was not inserted in the Constitution, because the Federal Convention desired to affix no such a stain upon the instrument. Neither did they insert the qualifying word "white." General Gates and others, at that early day, emancipated their slaves. In an address, after the peace of 1778, written by Mr. Madison, Congress declared—

"That it has ever been the pride and boast of America that the rights for which she contended were the rights of human nature."

I cannot help thinking, Mr. Speaker, that if the pen of Mr. Madison had been guided by the sentiment of the gentleman from New Jersey, he most certainly would have written "white human nature." But all the great names of that period rebuke the fallacious Democratic assumption that this Government was founded for and by white men only. Pendleton, Mason, Wythe, Lee—ancestor of the traitor general who made the name infamous—Grayson, St. George Tucker, Blair, Page, Parker, Randolph, Iredell, Spraight, Ramsey, McHenry, Samuel Chase, Franklin, the Adamases, Heath, Patrick Henry, John Jay, Faulkner, Pinkney of Maryland, Barbour, Hamilton, one and all, except a few South Carolinians, are on record, by word, deed, and life, against the infamous dogma that this is a "white man's Government" alone. Nor were their opinions expressed loosely, liable to various interpretations, or intended to be differently construed. Mr. Jefferson expressly speaks of slaves as "citizens" in his Notes on Virginia. He said most explicitly:

"The true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen in his person and property, and in their management."

Was Jefferson in favor of white men alone managing the persons and property of all over whom the ægis of the Republic was cast? His own words reply. Sir, another striking fact which a student of the discussion, preceding the adoption of the Constitution must notice, is this: that much of the opposition against the instrument grew out of the general desire to have its provisions made even more plain and direct. Nearly all the States demanded amendments which would strengthen impartial liberty. Readers of the Federalist will not fail to perceive that the writers therein argue earnestly on objections against the instrument, because it was not preceded by an ample bill of rights. The objection was not in favor of restriction, but that it was not comprehensive enough. I have thus, sir, given briefly the proofs that this Government's formation was participated in by all the people not held as slaves, that it was meant to include all men, and that the opinions and actions of all our distinguished men at that era were in favor of a still more liberal inclusion of classes.

Mr. Speaker, I now propose to show the service rendered by the colored race in the war which secured independence and prepared the way for the present Union. Here, too, our history is replete with refutations of the false Democracy which resists the passage of this bill.

Among the men who shared in the common interest and early agitation that paved the way to Lexington and Bunker Hill was one Christopher or Crispus Attacks, a mulatto, who had also been a slave. He fell, shot by one of Captain Proteus's soldiers, March 5, 1770, marshaling and leading the first resistance to British tyranny, and sealing by his blood the inception of the "white man's Government." It was a black soldier, named Salem, that at Bunker Hill shot the exulting British leader, Pitcairn, as he shouted "The day is ours!" Salem was afterward presented to Washington. History keeps the names of others of the same race serving at that battle. Among them was Titus Coburn, Alexander Arms, Barzilai Lew, of Andover, Massachusetts, and Cato Howe, of Plymouth. Each received a pension from this "white man's Government" for aiding to secure the independence of this "white man's country."

Seymour Burr, of Connecticut, was a fugitive slave who with a party of others tried to join the British to gain liberty. He was captured. His master, a brother of Aaron Burr, gave him the freedom he coveted on condition of his fighting for the country. He accepted the offer, and joined the seventh Connecticut regiment, under Colonel Brooks. He, too, received a pension, as did Jeremy Jones, serving in the same regiment. Judge Story, of Massachusetts, was a witness of the courage of the black soldiers in our revolutionary war. General Eustis says they entered the ranks with the whites. "The Bucks of America" was a colored company which, under command of Colonel Middleton, a colored man, went through the war, and at its close were presented with a banner by John Hancock. Charles Bowles, who died in 1843, was a revolutionary pensioner and a colored preacher, who, when a mere boy, enlisted in the American Army and served throughout the war. James Easton served at Dorchester Heights. Job Lewis, formerly a slave, served over six years, enlisting three times.

"The State of Massachusetts Bay," through its Legislature, in 1778, authorized the raising of a colored regiment, the officers to be white. Rhode Island, in February, 1778, authorized the raising of two battalions, to be composed of such slaves as should be willing to serve for their freedom, and in addition giving them such "bounties, wages, &c," as were allowed by the Continental Congress. The gallant conduct of these men at the battle of Red Bank is one of the memorable incidents of the Revolution. Four hundred men of color met and repulsed fifteen hundred Hessians, under Count Donop. When later, at Croton river, May 13, 1781, Colonel Greene, commander of this regiment, fell mortally wounded, his faithful black guard defended him with their lives. Every one was killed. Sir, I might go on, giving the names and referring to the deeds of hundreds of brave colored soldiers who, in that first perilous hour, were found willing to fight for a nation which held a majority of their race in bondage. The blood of the black man mingled in every contest, and every revolutionary battle-field answers the argument put forth on the other side of this House. Sir, not only did American men of color do honorable service in the Revolution, but men of the same race from the despised republic of Hayti, then a French colony, were ranged on our side. A regiment of Haytian colored men were part of our French allies at the siege of Savannah.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen on the other side of the House have solemnly warned us of the prejudices which exist between races. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] enthrones prejudice as one of the great forces of the people in the following words:

"Prejudice is to the mind what nerves are to the body. It gives impulse to thought and direction to judgment."

Further on he said, speaking for the opponents of this measure:

"We respect the intense prejudice which preserves our race in its purity, vigor, and supremacy."

Other gentlemen, not glorifying so unequivocally the prejudices which, blind and brutal in their manifestation, have grown out of the foul ideas implanted by slavery, and have been sedulously fostered by Democratic teachings, nevertheless catch up and herald the cry. Nowhere have we seen the ripe fruitage of such teachings better illustrated than in the riots and rapine not long since indulged in by the constituents of the gentleman from New York.

We are told in gloomy words of the horrors which are to follow the passage of this bill. But, sir, these words are not so fierce, nor are the prophetic appeals of the remnants of the slave oligarchy so full of evil foreboding as in other days resounded in this Hall, when these same men and this same prejudice resisted the abolition of slavery in this District.

I am in favor of this bill because I see in it the opposite of all this—the benign, harmonizing, and prosperous influences of freedom. Organized injustice is sure to provoke anarchy, and is in itself a despotism. The law of the Universe is justice; its method is progress. We must come within this rule in rearing the fabric of a reconstructed Government, or "the stone which was rejected of the builder" shall some day be the means of its fall, or else become the exalted crowning corner of the edifice. All history, so laboriously misrepresented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] teems with examples of the folly of injustice. The following words of De Tocqueville, quoted so inaptly in the speech against this bill by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] are an impressive warning of the dangerous doctrine which he and the opponents of this bill would make perpetual. Let me read them:

"If ever the free institutions of America are destroyed that event may be attributed to the unlimited authority of the majority, which may at some future day urge minorities to desperation and oblige them to have recourse to physical force. Anarchy will be the result, but it will have been brought about by despotism."—Democracy in America, vol. 1, p. 317.

This, sir, is the precise result of the policy of gentlemen on the other side of this House, in struggling to so shape the legislation of this nation, and of its component States, as to make the minority, upon whose neck they and their friends have so long held the iron heel of oppression, rise in hopeless revolt. The spirit of persecution, which words but faintly conceal, has marked the reactionaries of all time.

Sir, this is not the spirit which shall guide my action. The wisest thinker England has ever produced, Francis Bacon, has well said:

"A statesman considers even the prejudices of a people."

This axiom should be accepted as containing a profound principle of administration; but not by weaving prejudices into forms of government, and making them the foundation of our laws. No, sir. Bacon declares that the true statesman endeavors to overcome prejudices, to show the benefits of just action, and by all reasonable means to prove their utility. What is the foundation principle of civil society? Herbert Spencer has well said, in his Social Statics, that—

"It is the liberty of each limited by the liberty of all." "Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man."

It is only when individual liberty is detrimental to the liberty of others, as by acts of crime, or when individual or national life is at stake, that a deprivation can be allowed. Hence all must have the means of protection, whether it be the simple force of the savage or the complex forms of modern civilization. This means of protection belongs to all men, not as a bestowed privilege, but as a right inherent to existence as members of society. Here, I conceive, is the difference between American democracy and all other systems of government. These, in a greater or less degree, bestow privileges and legislate for classes. Our democracy protects rights. It was organized for that end, not to bestow them. That is not within its power, because each is entitled to the rights of all and all of each. Sir, this is my idea of American democracy.

From these premises, Mr. Speaker, I deduce the right of suffrage—the most potential means of protection. Nor is this right bounded by the accidents of birth or former condition. It is not to be measured by other men's prejudices. Speaking of the very class on whose enfranchise-ment this debate hinges, Mr. Jefferson said, more than half a century since:

"Whatever be their degree of talent, it is no measure of their rights."

I beg the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] who painted so darkly the poverty and ignorance of the colored men of this District, to consider this pregnant sentence from the pen of him who is justly revered as the great apostle of popular Democracy.

This cry of poverty and ignorance is not new. I remember that those who first followed the Son of man, the Saviour of the world, were not the learned rabbis, not the enlightened scholar, not the rich man or the pious Pharisee. They were the poor and needy, the peasant and the fisherman. I remember, also, that the more learned the slaveholder the greater the rebel. I remember that no black skin covered so false a heart or misdirected brain, that when the radiant banner of our nationality was near or before him, he did not understand its meaning and remain loyal to its demands. The man capable of taking care of himself, of wife and children, and in addition by his unrequited toil to hold up his oppressor, must have intelligence enough in the long run to wield the highest means of protection we can give.

But, sir, it is for our benefit, as well as for the benefit of the proscribed class, that I vote for and support impartial manhood suffrage in this District. We cannot afford as a nation to keep any class ignorant, or oppress the weak. We must establish here republican government. That which wrongs one man in the end recoils on the many. Sir, if we accept, as the Republican party of the Union, our true position and our duty, we shall nobly win. If we are false and recreant, we shall miserably fail. Let us have faith in the people and the grand logic of a mighty revolution, and dare to do right. Class legislation will be the inevitable result of class power; and what would follow, so far as the colored race are concerned, let the recent tragedy of Jamaica answer.

Sir, it is the foundation of my political faith, as it was the faith of Washington and Jefferson and Madison, and of those who fought with them for the republican idea, that the sovereign power of this Government belongs to all, and not a part, of the American people. The right of all men who come within the province of the national authority to a voice in public affairs is as sacred as the rights of human nature themselves, or the laws of God. If the atrocious sentiments daily enunciated on the other side of this House by the representatives of modern Democracy are to prevail, then I see but little hope for the perpetuity and welfare of republican institutions in America. The maxim of our fathers, that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," had better be stricken from the immortal Declaration of Independence if this nation is to assent in any way to the monstrous fallacy of the Dred Scott decision, and the corresponding assaults upon the rights of humanity so boldly enunciated by the gentleman from New Jersey early in this debate, and so readily received and indorsed by the party he represents.

Mr. Speaker, I arraign the arguments and the policy of the Democratic Representatives upon this floor as a despotic and malignant assault upon the masses of the American people, upon their liberties and their rights. This Dred Scott policy ought to have died with its author, and been consigned to that "everlasting infamy" with which posterity will surely receive so foul a stain upon the records of American jurisprudence. It may be fitting, however, that in its passage to the tomb it should be nursed and eulogized by a political party which but recently declared the late war for the Union a failure, invited an armistice with the assassins of the national life, resisted the filling up of our armies, incited riots in our great cities, and gave all the weight of party influence to the enemies of the country in the hours of national peril and disaster. I say, sir, it may be fitting that this dictum of a pro-slavery judge, this judicial-political outrage, should be reiterated and defended by such a party as now seeks to make lawgivers of rebels, establish an oligarchy in the place of republicanism, and place the control of the Government of the nation in the hands of the few at the expense of the many.

But I do not stop here. The principles involved in the arguments put forth on the other side of the House are not alone destructive to the rights of the defenseless, intelligent, and patriotic colored men of this District, but they militate with a double effect and stronger purpose against the poor whites of the North and of the South, against the German, the Irishman, and the poor and oppressed of every race, who come to our shores to escape the oppression of despotic Governments, and to seek the protection of a Government the true theory of which reposes in every citizen a portion of its sovereign power. Against this attempt to deny or abridge in any way the rights of the weak, the poor, and the defenseless, and to transfer the governing power of the nation to the favored classes, to the rich and the powerful, and thus change the very purpose and principles of our republican system, I protest in the name of constitutional freedom, and in behalf of equal rights and equal laws.

I protest against this stealthy innovation upon popular rights, in the name of the toiling millions of the land; and I warn the House and the country of the untold mischief and disaster which must come to distract and divide the Republic in the future, if we follow the pernicious and destructive doctrines founded upon either the prejudices of class, caste, wealth, or power. I protest in the name of a constituency whose early history was a sublime and persistent struggle against the prejudices of pampered and arrogant ruffianism at home, and the worse than ruffian spirit of the Administrations of Pierce and Buchanan, and the Democratic traitors who at that time constituted a majority of this House, and were engaged in preparing the nation for its harvest of blood. We must go back to the spirit and purposes of the founders of our Government. We must accept the grand logic of the mighty revolution from which we are now emerging. We must repudiate, now and forever, these assaults upon the masses of the people, and upon the fundamental principles of popular rights. I accept in their full force and effect the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and by constitutional amendment and law of Congress I would stamp them with irrevocable power upon the political escutcheon of the new and regenerated Republic. I would avoid the mistakes of the past, and I would spurn that cringing timidity by which, through all history, liberty has been sacrificed and humanity betrayed.

Sir, I hesitate not to say that if we do not gather up, in the process of national reconstruction, the enduring safeguards of future peace, we shall be false to our history and unmindful of the grand responsibilities now devolving upon us. The establishment of impartial suffrage in this District will be a fitting commencement of the work. It will be hailed by the friends of freedom everywhere as a return to a policy of national justice too long delayed. In behalf of the State I have the honor to represent, and upon whose soil this contest for a larger liberty and a nobler nationality was first submitted to the arbitrament of arms, I hail this measure with feelings of satisfaction and pride. It is the legitimate result of the courage and fidelity of the hardy pioneers of Kansas in 1856, who dared to face the blandishment of power and the arrogance and brutality of slavery when compromisers trembled, and northern sycophants of an oligarchic despotism, then, as now, scowled and fretted at the progress of free principles.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in the discussion of the propositions embraced in this bill. It had not occurred to me there was such a diversity of opinion on the question of suffrage in this country. I had supposed the American system of popular Government was so well settled and so clearly defined that the debate on this bill would range itself on either side of the question whether the elective franchise is a natural or acquired right; that those who hold the doctrine that this is a natural and inalienable right which belongs to all men who inhabit a country controlled by one Government would be found advocating this measure on that principle, while those who hold the other doctrine would be found contending that the elective franchise is an element of popular government, to be controlled only by those to whom such Government belongs; and then I expected, out of so large, respectable, and intelligent a body of men, there would be one or two at least who would refer to the free and equal clause of the Declaration of Independence, while the great mass of debate would be directed to the question of expediency involved in the proposition, now for the first time in the history of the Federal Government seriously entertained, of extending it by Federal authority to a race of men who, whatever may be their claim to the protection of life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness under this Government, have no claim whatever to the ordering, management, direction, control, and administration of the Government itself. I expected that those who contend that all men who inhabit a country controlled by a popular Government have an inalienable right to control, direct, and administer that Government, would favor this bill, and I am willing to accord to that class of its advocates the entire consistency of their course.

I have neither the time nor the inclination now to take up the various arguments and reasons that gentlemen have assigned for the course they propose to take, and attempt to expose their fallacy or answer them in detail. I prefer to meet the question squarely, and leave others to elaborate it.

Some portions of this country seemed a little shocked when my distinguished colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] a few weeks ago, opened his batteries with such terrible fury against the doctrine that this is a white man's Government. Many advocates of negro suffrage affected to treat his doctrines as absurd, and he himself, with very becoming modesty, disclaimed any intention of leading the Republican party, or it being responsible for what he said; but they little knew what he knows so well, that unless that doctrine is utterly and entirely demolished, the claim of the negro race in this country to have the elective franchise conferred upon it by Federal authority is without any foundation in right and justice.

Ours is a popular Government, a representative democracy. It is republican in form. Our fathers made it what it is so far as its form is concerned. They framed the States together into one common Union, and whatever theories may have prevailed before the war, that tribunal has given its irreversible decision that from this Union no State can either secede or be expelled.

This country is now under one Government. It was not so before the Union under the Constitution, or at furthest, before the Confederation. In the days of the colonies there were several Governments in this country. All were founded by white men, men of the European race. White men discovered the country, organized and established these Governments, and the Governments so established by them were their own as much as the country they inhabited or the soil they tilled. In the course of time they changed the form, but never parted with their right to control and administer the Government as against all other races of mankind.

So far from being a discoverer of this country, the negro is not even an immigrant. He is not here of his own free will and accord. However wrong it may have been to thus force him from his own country and make him a stranger in a strange land, it was nevertheless done, and all the rights that he by his presence here could acquire are those which have been graciously extended to him. In his slavery they were very few as against the white man, and in his freedom they are no more than have been granted.

To-day they are the right to dwell among us, to labor and enjoy its fruits, to emigrate, and the right to enjoy life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness. These the Government acknowledges; but he is not the Government, nor is he any part of it. Should he undertake to assert a claim to control and manage the Government he becomes a rebel, and forfeiting the rights he held he falls like Lucifer from his heaven.

Let him give no heed to the instigation of political devils and he is safe. Not only is it true that the negro has had no part nor lot in the organizing and establishing of any of the Governments of this country, popular or otherwise, but he has never yet anywhere upon the face of this earth organized and established any sort of popular Government whatsoever. Whence, then, comes any claim on his part to exercise the prerogatives of Government in this country?

The negro, sir, is in possession of Governments upon this hemisphere. The negro is in possession of Governments in Central America, in South America, and in some of the islands of the western hemisphere; but he never organized a Government in any of those places. The position which he has acquired there has been obtained by the yielding up of the white race to him, either by his rebellion or by their relinquishing to him the administration of the Government.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask him of what complexion he supposes the men were who adopted the constitution of the republic of Liberia?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not on this hemisphere. I am not aware that the Government of Liberia is located anywhere on this hemisphere. But yet it may be considered as included in the scope of my remark that the negro never yet organized and established a Government anywhere. I think, from my knowledge of the Government of Liberia, that it was established by the white race, just as a New England mechanic constructs a locomotive or steam-engine which is afterwards run by a negro in Delaware or Maryland. [Laughter.]

At the college where I was educated there were four or five colored men educated by philanthropic gentlemen, or philanthropic societies, for the express purpose of sending them to Africa to administer that Government; and I have heard of a great deal of money being raised in the United States by white men, out of white men's earnings, for the purpose of running that Liberian Government. I deny that the Liberian Government is the offspring of the negro race. It did not originate with him; it is not his.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask of what complexion the members of the convention were who framed the constitution of the republic of Liberia?

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I do not know anything about their complexion.

Mr. KELLEY. While on the floor, I would like also to ask my colleague with reference to an earlier remark of the gentleman, that white men discovered America, whether they were what we call white men, or whether they were not what are generally known as Basque?

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, sir, that is propounding two questions. As to the white men, they were of the European race. That is what we all mean when we talk about white men.

Mr. KELLEY. A little mixed.

Mr. JOHNSON. As to the complexion of those persons who got up the constitution and framework of the Government of Liberia, it matters very little. I presume they were all of the negro race; some were as black as could be, and others were quite sallow.

But I submit that that is not the point. The gentleman knows, as everybody knows, that the Liberian Government was gotten up by a sort of emigrant aid society in the United States, similar to that which was got up by Massachusetts some years ago for the purpose of colonizing the Territory of Kansas. The colony and Government of Liberia did not originate with the African race.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I apprehend that the republic of Liberia, its rapid progress, its wonderful absorption of people recently reclaimed from barbarism, illustrates the power of organization and Government such as the history of no other community in the world has ever done. The basis of that community was, as the gentleman has intimated, a mass of freed slaves sent under the auspices of benevolent societies from this country. There never have been fifteen thousand of them sent there. The early founders are still alive. It is the work of a generation; and yet its jurisdiction, within which the laws of the northern States of America are administered and quoted as authority, as we quote those of England, is now extended over half a million of Christian people. Those fifteen thousand people must have had some organizing and executive faculty.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman wanders entirely from the point suggested by me, the point of contradiction between us. My assertion is that it was not a Government established, originated, by the African race, and the gentleman in his remark proves that, because he says that they have adopted our form of government and our laws, and quote the decisions of the United States and of England. Why, sir, they took their constitution and laws right from us, and the next thing we hear will be that they will have a constitutional amendment adopted in imitation of ours. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. They have nowhere inserted the word "black" in their constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt they imitate us in many things that we do, and it is very well for them. The men who were educated in the United States and transferred there have not forgotten their alma mater.

I repeat that there never was yet upon the face of the earth a popular Government organized by the African race, originated by them. You have your King of Dahomey and your Geffard, the one an original African, and the other borrowing a form of government from Europe. If anything be necessary to prove that such is the case, let us go to the Governments that they have undertaken to run, to use a popular phrase. Go to Central America, where they have succeeded in obtaining possession of the Governments, and what kind of Governments have they? Can they be called republics? Can they be called popular Governments? Go to South America. Have they popular Governments there? What is it that has torn Mexico all to pieces? The negro blood that runs through the race. The right of suffrage, the elective franchise, is the foundation of all popular Government. Who votes for others should be eligible to be voted for. The governed are themselves the Government. The governed are themselves the governors, for they control and direct their own Government, and the moment a man becomes a voter he becomes one of the Government.

And here, upon this point, let me say that we hear a great deal about the right to vote being extended to negroes as necessary to secure to them the protection that they are entitled to under this Government. Now, sir, the fact that negroes are governed in this country without the right of voting is no proof or evidence against our Government that it is not self-government. The negro is protected in this country in all his rights. It secures to him the fruits of his labor, the protection of his life, his liberty, and his property. The right of suffrage belongs to those and those only to whom the Government belongs; and if we recognize the right to the one, so we must concede the other. The regulation and control of the elective franchise within the several States belongs to them exclusively, but their action must be limited to a regulation. They cannot prohibit its exercise without interfering with the guarantee of the Federal Constitution to the people of each State. Not if an absolute democracy, in which the masses assemble and pass their laws by town meeting as the ancients did, nor even a representative democracy, according to the American system, but a Government which stands upon the broad basis of being republican in form. Some gentlemen contend that under this clause of the Constitution the Federal Government is bound to decide that the people of the late southern confederacy shall not be represented here until they extend the elective franchise in the several States to the negro race, in order that those State governments may be republican in form. Nothing can be more absurd and unreasonable. Did not those who made the Constitution know what the clause meant; and if they did, why is it that three fourths of a century have gone round without this guarantee being enforced or even attempted to be enforced? But whatever arguments may be adduced upon that proposition, they do not relate to the present bill, unless by analogy we are bound to grant to the inhabitants of this District a government republican in form; and it cannot even be maintained that a Government is not republican in form unless all men have a right to vote. I think that a Government can be republican in form without conceding to all men the privilege of the elective franchise.

Mr. WARD. I would ask the gentleman, if a majority of the freemen of any State are disqualified from exercising the right of suffrage, is that a republican form of government?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that it is; and I ask the gentleman whether the government of the State of New York is a democracy.

Mr. WARD. It is "republican in form."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. WARD. The majority of the people of the State of New York are entitled to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know exactly what is the majority of the people of the State of New York; but I know that there are a great many children and women there, and they are not allowed to vote. The government of the State of New York is a representative democracy; it is a part of our American system of government; it is not an absolute democracy, for it is not necessary that all the people should be permitted to vote.

Whence comes the discrimination in regard to minors? And how many persons are deprived of voting in the State of New York by a most tyrannical and outrageous registry law, which compels a man to go twice to the polls before he can vote? How many thousands are rejected because the laws that guard the ballot-box are too stringent? Certain regulations are necessary to protect the ballot-box; but when those regulations become too stringent, so stringent as to keep the voter away, they do injustice to our system, though they do not change our form of government. Now this is certainly a new doctrine that is contended for, a doctrine that the framers of our Government never dreamed of. For when they promulgated this Constitution of ours, this guarantee of a republican form of government to the several States, the elective franchise was much more restricted than it is now. If, therefore, the negro race, up to the commencement of the late war, had no part in this Government, what has been done by any one since that time that established his claim to any such part now? Prior to this war it never was mooted in this Hall that the Federal Government should undertake to confer upon the negro race the elective franchise. All parties and classes of men admitted that it was a question not within the scope of the Federal Constitution. But now it seems that the principle has gained new force. Now, has the negro rendered any service to the Government that entitles him to make this claim as a matter of right?

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who during the whole war steadily opposed the putting of negro troops into the military service of the United States. I never believed that their services were indispensable, and I am doubly confirmed in that opinion now. I believed then that those who urged the employment of the negro in the Army did so for the express purpose of giving rise to some such claim as this. The negro, however, did render some military service, and now it is contended that in gratitude for those services we ought to extend to him and graciously confer upon him this participation in our Government. All that was promised the negro has been given him for the services he has rendered, and more, too. He was never promised the emancipation of his race in this country, yet that has been given him. He was not invited to take part in the contest by any proclamation or act of Congress. He was treated simply as one liable to serve, and allowed pay, bounty, and pensions. No formal call was ever made upon the negroes as a race to enter the service in our late struggle. No promise was held out to them that if they did enter the service their race should be benefited in any way whatsoever. They were treated as liable to service, liable to draft, and granted pay, bounty, and pensions.

Gentlemen know that fact very well. I remember perfectly the first recruiting of negroes that took place in Pennsylvania. Some one or two negroes from Massachusetts made their appearance in our town and commenced gobbling up our negroes. They offered very high bounties to fill quotas in Massachusetts, and then, when the conscription law came the negroes were in great demand; and they were drafted and forced into the service of the Government. As an organized body of men in the United States they took no action at all. They had no representatives of their race here, to whom they could express their desire to enter the military service, or by whom they could negotiate any terms with the Government of the United States by which they should gain any privileges of citizenship as white men of this country. I am very well reminded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] near me that they were refused officers of their own race. So subordinate were they to the white men in this war that they were refused to have officers of their own race to command them.

Well, sir, I was speaking of the manner in which they were drafted. I will give you an instance which I remember, a scene that took place in my own town. Some bounty brokers from Philadelphia brought up a negro to put him in the service as a substitute. The brokers about Easton got around the negro, and finally stole him away. One of them told me himself that he kept that negro hid in a garret for three days and three nights, until the Philadelphia brokers had gone off. But not venturing to produce him then, he sent him out into the country in the middle of the night, over the Blue Mountain, into the Pocono region, and there kept him ten days and ten nights longer, until he was satisfied the Philadelphia brokers were all gone, and then he brought him down; and, said he, "I made $500 on that nigger." Ought that man to vote? That he went into the service and fought I have no doubt; that he obeyed the orders of his commanders I have no doubt; and if he was down at the big mine in front of Petersburg I have no doubt he ran as well as any other negro there; because any one who would consent to be locked in a garret for three days and three nights, then to be transported forty miles over the mountains and kept there for ten days, then brought back and put in as a substitute in that way, would certainly obey the orders of his superiors, and when told to charge he would charge. But ought that man to vote? Does his service in the Army under those circumstances give him a right to the elective franchise? How many thousands of the men who were in the service of the United States, and rendered good military service in the war, are of the same class with that negro?

Let me mention another incident as an illustration on this subject. I was standing one day at the junction of New York avenue and Fifteenth street in this city, in conversation with two gentlemen who had been appointed by the city authorities here to fill up their quota. While I was standing there, five negroes, who, from their appearance, were undoubtedly fugitive slaves, came up and handed to one of those gentlemen a paper. He looked at it, and pointed them to the pass office just above, where they could get passes to go over to the Freedmen's Village on the other side of the Potomac. The negroes passed on, and the gentleman remarked to me, "That is the way the negroes are put into the service here." They had been down to Colonel Green to get directions to the Freedmen's Village. He had given them a slip of paper, with the direction, to which he had added, "Can't you recruit these fellows?" The agent refused to undertake it. The object was to get them in by hook or by crook, to take advantage of their ignorance, get them to sign the muster-roll, and then send them to the front. Hundreds and thousands of negro recruits were got in that way by agents who followed the Army, and gathered up slaves who had just run away from their masters, and who, ignorant of their rights as men could be, were easily induced to go into the ranks of the Army. Yet gentlemen tell us that men of this class, because they fought in the service of the country, are certainly entitled to the elective franchise as a reward for the service which they rendered.

Gentlemen tell us, too, that, during the revolutionary struggle there was, here and there, a negro soldier in our Army. Well, sir, it is not worth while for us to go back to the history of that struggle, and show how those persons were induced to enter that service. Liberty at that time had its guardians, who were sufficient for that day. The men who made the Constitution of the United States knew what service had been rendered by the negroes during the war of the Revolution; and if that service had been sufficient to entitle them to be made citizens under our Government the founders of the Government would have guaranteed them that position under the Constitution. But three quarters of a century have rolled round, and now it is just discovered that the services rendered by the negroes in the Revolution should be rewarded by allowing the negroes of this day to vote in the District of Columbia.

Another class of arguments is adduced here in favor of the negro voting. We are told that in this District negroes have acquired some property—houses, lands, churches, &c.—and that therefore they ought to vote. Mr. Speaker, the elective franchise is not to be sold out upon such considerations as these. If the negroes of this District have acquired property under the administration of the city by the white people, are they not content to hold it? If they complain that they are not properly governed, that their property is not adequately protected here, then it is the duty of Congress to see that such laws are passed as will protect them in the full enjoyment of the fruits of their labor. Do they complain that they are obliged to pay taxes to the Government for protecting their property, their liberties, and their lives? Well, sir, if they can anywhere else obtain more cheaply the protection of their property, their liberties, and their lives, they have our leave to go there. It does not lie in the mouth of any man in this country to complain that he has to pay a slight tax for the protection which the Government affords to his property, his liberty, and his life.

I repeat, that any man who is unwilling to pay the Government tax imposed upon his property for protection let him put it in a storehouse and pay the storage. [Laughter.]

I am opposed, sir, to all of these qualifications of voters of my own race, resting upon the payment of taxes, registration, and everything in the nature of restriction. The payment of tax, the requirement of residence, and tests of that character, are necessary to protect the ballot-box against fraudulent voting, but they confer no right upon people entitled to vote as citizens. A man who votes without lawful authority deprives a lawful voter of the effect of his vote. The payment of tax under our system, therefore, gives no man the right to vote. It is not a franchise to be bought and sold in that way.

Then, sir, comes another class of arguments.

We are told that the negro is intelligent and capable of voting; that there are some negroes who are more intelligent, better educated, have better reasoning powers than certain white men, and that these intelligent negroes do not vote while certain ignorant white men do vote. There is nothing in that at all. Elective franchise is not based upon a man's intelligence. Hence the tests that a man should be able to read the Constitution and write his name before he should vote are all idle. Suppose when a negro comes up to vote in the District of Columbia he is asked how he spells his name. The judge of the election says to the negro, "Can you spell your name?" "Yes." "Spell it." "B-o-b-b." [Laughter.] The judge of the election would, as the negro spells it with three B's instead of two, be compelled to decide that he should not be allowed to vote. I know there are gentlemen in this House who, if the clerks at the desk were the judges of election, would, under these tests, deny them the right to vote, because they could not write their names. [Laughter.]

These tests are all idle. The elective franchise belongs to the man who is a citizen of the Government. It belongs in this Government to the white man, who from his race is a citizen of his Government. I do not deny that the Government may confer the privilege of citizenship upon negroes, but the white man is a citizen without that.

Gentlemen agree that the negro race is inferior to the white or European race, yet there seems to be something that induces them to do something for the negro. Some, upon the free and equal clause of the Declaration of Independence, say that this race of men belongs to the Government, and that therefore all people under it have the right to participate in its administration. Some go half way, and are willing that the negro should have some part in the Government; and some are exceedingly jealous lest, if the negro be allowed to vote, he may become a controlling power. They only want a little sprinkling of the negro, just enough to spice it, with the property qualification, payment of tax, intelligence, or something of that kind. They are willing he should vote, provided he would always agree to vote in a minority. They are willing he shall vote provided they can limit him so that there will be no danger of his controlling the election.

What kind of privilege is that? It is like the voting privilege conferred upon our soldiers in the Army. They were to get the tickets as best they could. They were allowed to vote, provided they voted right, in the opinion of their superiors. Some who did not vote right had the satisfaction to know that their ballots were changed, and they were made to count contrary to their wishes by those gentlemen who claim to be the exclusive friends of the soldiers' voting. Philadelphia has been the great stamping-ground for that sort of thing. At the last election we had a commissioner elected by some seven or eight hundred majority. He was a Democrat, and had been a major in the Army. By and by election returns came in from New York and every other direction, and he was beaten by several hundred votes. An investigation of those returns shows that there were no such persons as those who were claimed to have voted in the Army; that the companies returned as voting unanimously never voted. The poll lists returned proved to be made up of the names of men who had deserted or died years before. Out of this whole return every vote thus far has been proven a fabrication and a fraud.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman, I presume, does not wish the House to infer from his statement that the colored votes, to which he has just alluded in the case of Given, to which I suppose he refers, were given by negro soldiers.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what the color was.

Mr. THAYER. From the manner in which the gentleman speaks, it might seem as if the colored votes would count in Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON. But colored soldiers' votes were of course just as good as white ones if they had been given after they were dead two years. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Only I did not see exactly how it supports the gentleman's argument.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot explain it for the benefit of the gentleman himself. I am addressing the whole House. But I say that this conferring upon the soldiers the elective franchise, and when they fail to exercise it putting in false returns for them, is about as complete a mockery as giving to a few of the smartest and best-educated negroes, or those who have a little property, the right to vote, and thus attempting to guard it so that they can have no controlling influence.

Sir, the man who votes must be eligible to be voted for. There can be no discrimination between men who have a common lot in the Government. For I come back to this proposition: that the voter is at the foundation of a popular Government. The power to govern is conventional, as drawn from the fact that he is a constituent part of that government itself. Therefore all machine voting falls to the ground. By machine voting I mean that kind of voting they used to have in the city of Baltimore in Know-Nothing times—votes given by Blood-Tubs, Black-Snakes, and Plug-Uglies. I do not know all those names; I have almost forgotten them. Machine voting is that by which a man puts a few hundred ballots in a district and demands of certain persons a certain number of votes when the poll is closed, and if that is not enough, to have it fixed up by return day.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not suppose my friend designs any disrespect to Billy McMullen; but I advise him to be cautious. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. He can take care of himself.

Mr. JOHNSON. I never had anything to do with the Know Nothings except in 1854. I was a candidate for the Legislature, and just at the close of the polls I looked back over my shoulder and saw "Sam" a short distance behind. I do not know anything about Billy McMullen or my colleague's friends generally. I suppose he is some gentleman in Lancaster. [Laughter.] But I do remember that after the great contest of 1854 was fought in Pennsylvania we had a United States Senator to elect. But whether my distinguished colleague was a Know-Nothing or not I do not know. The first time I ever saw him was during the canvass for United States Senator. He knows very well, however, what I mean by this Know-Nothing organization that carried on for awhile a sort of machine voting, or voting by proxy.

And here I am reminded that it looks to me very much in this city as if this negro voting was to be a continuation of the substitute business—not under the conscription law, however. In this city the resident population are very unanimous against negroes taking part in the elective franchise. But there is a very large floating population which sways about the District and fills the galleries of the Houses of Congress. They are not residents here. They are clerks in the Departments, that go home once a year to renew their allegiance to the candidate of their district, and then claim, when he is elected to Congress, that he must keep them in office all the time. At the election the other day that class of persons did not vote at all, because, if they had, they would not be able to vote at home next fall; and in that case their member of Congress might forget them. But inasmuch as this class of foreigners in this city, employés of the Government, are unable themselves to vote against the residents, it seems that they have circulated petitions in all the Departments asking that the negroes might vote as their substitutes, just as the same clerks, a great number of them, fought their battles in the war by substitutes.

Now, it cannot be possible that there is any necessity for this change in this city. I remember two or three years ago that there was some difficulty in Congress with regard to the safety of this District on the question of loyalty. I remember we had some action here, and that the mayor of the city had to be locked up about three weeks in some fort till he would consent to resign, so that the present mayor could take possession and administer the affairs of the city as a loyal man should do. Mr. Wallach had been a candidate, and claimed that he was elected, and was contesting the office with the acting mayor.

But the Government came to the conclusion that Mayor Berrett was disloyal, and so he was locked up until he consented to resign, and so let in a good, loyal man; and this ended the contest.

And now that loyal man is hardly loyal enough; now it is proposed to put the city in the hands of somebody else; another class of persons are to be manipulated into voters here so they may take control of the city. Who propose to do this thing? Why, members of Congress who have not a dollar's worth of property to be protected by the city government; members of Congress who claim no right to vote in this District; members of Congress who, it may possibly be, though it is hardly probable, have not paid up all their board bills; members of Congress coming from all parts of the country, from the Aroostook to Vancouver, and saying to the people of this District, "You do not know how to manage your own affairs; we will impose a voting population upon you who will take better care of your property than you have done heretofore."

Sir, we hear a tremendous outcry in this House in favor of popular government and about the guarantee of the Constitution of the United States to the several States that they shall have republican governments. How are the poor people of this District to have a republican form of government if gentlemen who have come to this city perhaps for the first time in their lives undertake to control them as absolutely and arbitrarily as Louis Napoleon controls France or Maximilian Mexico? Gentlemen ask, what right have they to hold an election and express their sentiments? What right have they to hold such an election? Surely they ought to have the right to petition, for their rulers are generally arbitrary enough.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me ridiculously inconsistent for gentlemen upon this floor to prate so much about a republican form of government, and rise here and offer resolution after resolution about the Monroe doctrine and the downtrodden Mexicans, while they force upon the people of this District a government not of their own choice, because the voter in a popular government is a governor himself. But, sir, this is only part of a grand plan. Gentlemen who dare not go before their white constituents and urge that negroes shall have a vote in their own States, come here and undertake to thrust negro suffrage upon the people here. Gentlemen whose States have repudiated the idea of giving the elective franchise to negroes, come here and are willing to give the suffrage to negroes here, as if they intended to make this little District of Columbia a sort of negro Eden; as if they intended to say to the negroes of Virginia and Maryland and Delaware, "You have no right to vote in these States, but if you will go to Washington you can vote there." I imagine I can see them swarming up from different sections of the country to this city and inquiring where the polls are. Agents, men and women, such as there are at work in this city, will no doubt be at work in these States telling them to pack their knapsacks and march to Washington, for on such a day there is to be an election, and there they will have the glorious privilege of the white man. Sir, all this doctrine is destructive of the American system of government which recognizes the right of no man to participate in it unless he is a citizen, which secures to the citizen his voice in the control and management of the Government, and prevents those not citizens from standing in the way of the exercise of his just rights.

This Government does not belong to any race so that it can be divested or disposed of. The present age have no right to terminate it. It is ours to enjoy and administer, and to transmit to posterity unimpaired as we received it from the fathers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is only recently that I entertained the purpose to speak at all upon this bill, and it was my expectation to avail myself of the kindness of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to divide with him the time allotted to him by the rules of the House; but I accept the opportunity now presented of speaking before the previous question is demanded, to state certain views I entertain on this subject.

I may say, in the beginning, that I am opposed to all dilatory motions upon this bill. I am opposed to the instructions moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] because I see in them no advantage to anybody, and I apprehend from their adoption much evil to the country. It should be borne in mind that when we emancipated the black people we not only relieved ourselves from the institution of slavery, we not only conferred upon them freedom, but we did more, we recognized their manhood, which, by the old Constitution and the general policy and usage of the country, had been, from the organization of the Government until the emancipation proclamation, denied to all of the enslaved colored people. As a consequence of the recognition of their manhood, certain results follow in accordance with the principles of this Government, and they who believe in this Government are, by necessity, forced to accept those results as a consequence of the policy of emancipation which they have inaugurated and for which they are responsible.

But to say now, having given freedom to them, that they shall not enjoy the essential rights and privileges of men, is to abandon the principle of the proclamation of emancipation, and tacitly to admit that the whole emancipation policy is erroneous.

It has been suggested that it is premature to demand immediate action upon the question of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. I am not personally responsible for the presence of the bill at the present time, but I am responsible for the observation that there never has been a day during a session of Congress since the emancipation proclamation, ay, since the negroes of this District were emancipated, when it was not the duty of the Government, which by the Constitution is intrusted with exclusive jurisdiction in this District, to confer upon the men of this District, without distinction of race or color, the rights and privileges of men. And, therefore, there can be nothing premature in this measure, and I cannot see how any one who supports the proclamation of emancipation, which is a recognition of the manhood of the whole colored people of this country, can hesitate as to his duty; and while I make no suggestion as to the duty of other men, I have a clear perception of my own. And, first, we are bound to treat the colored people in this District in regard to the matter of voting precisely as we treat white people. And I do not hesitate to express the opinion that if the question here to-day were whether any qualification should be imposed upon white voters in this District, if they alone were concerned, this House would not, ay, not ten men upon this floor would, consider whether any qualifications should be imposed or not.

What are the qualifications suggested? They are three. First and most attractive, service in the Army or Navy of the United States. I shall have occasion to say if I discuss, as I hope to do, the nature and origin of the right of voting, that there is not the least possible connection between service in the Army and Navy and the exercise of the elective franchise; none whatever. These men have performed service, and I am for dealing justly with them because they have performed service. But I am more anxious to deal justly by them because they are men. And when it is remembered that for months and almost for years after the opening of the rebellion we refused to accept the services of colored persons in the armies of the country, it is with an ill grace that we now decline to allow the vote of any man because he has not performed that service.

The second is the property qualification. I hope it is not necessary in this day and this hour of the Republic to argue anywhere that a property qualification is not only unjust in itself, but that it is odious to the people of this country to a degree which cannot be expressed. Everywhere, I believe, for half a century, it has been repudiated by the people. Does anybody contemplate such a qualification to the exercise of the elective franchise in the case of black people or white?

And next, reading and writing, or reading, as a qualification is demanded, and an appeal is made to the example of Massachusetts. I wish gentlemen who now appeal to Massachusetts would often appeal to her in other matters where I can more conscientiously approve her policy. But it is a different proposition in Massachusetts as a practical measure. When, ten years ago, this qualification was imposed upon the people of Massachusetts, it excluded no person who was then a voter. For two centuries we have had in Massachusetts a system of public instruction open to the children of the whole people without money and without price. Therefore all the people there had had opportunities for education. Now, why should the example of such a State be quoted to justify refusing suffrage to men who have been denied the privilege of education, and whom it has been a crime to teach? Is there no difference?

I suppose it will happen, even if you pass this reading amendment, that between any two annual elections, any negro twenty-one years of age in this city, or who may come here, will acquire the ability to read. The requirement will not exclude many men. My objection is, not that in this District it will exclude a great number from the exercise of the elective franchise, but I do object to it as a matter of principle. The right to vote is a higher and better right than can be derived from the simple fact that a man can read.

I have often elsewhere endeavored to trace the origin and nature of the right to vote. I believe that during this discussion the views I entertain have not been stated; and therefore, with such brevity as I can command, I will venture to state the opinion I entertain of the nature and proper limitations of the elective franchise. And while it may not be a natural right, like the right of locomotion, like the right to breathe, a natural personal right, still I think I can offer suggestions, deduced from the law of nature, which will show that it is a natural social right. I accept as the basis of what I have to say, the great law of nature supported by revelation, the existence of the family, from which no people, savage or civilized, has ever escaped. The family exists by divine authority. It is the first law of society, of the community; it is the element of all States, and it has generally one idea, one opinion, and one will upon all questions affecting the fortunes of the family or of any of its members.

Thus the creation of man, and his doings after his creation, illustrate most conclusively two facts—the existence of the family and the unity of the will of the family. When we admit that the family is the element of the State, the unit of society, that it has but one will, what follows? That whenever more than one family is in existence, and the question arises what shall be done with reference to the community of families, then the families are to be consulted. Hence arises the doctrine that there can be no just government except by the consent of the governed.

What I maintain next is that you have no right to exclude from this consultation any one of the families, for the moment you do so you violate the principle of the Government. Consequently but one voice is needed for the expression of the one will of the family; and the question then arises, whose voice shall it be? Properly, the voice of that one who, if the Government constituted by his agency and authority be assailed, is to peril his life in its defense. Thus is demonstrated the priority of right by nature which gives to the man the expression of the voice of the family rather than to the woman or the child.

Next, Mr. Speaker, it is not seen that, if these propositions be true, the right to vote exists independently of all human agency in the sense of law; and the doctrine that the right of voting is a conventional right, is not sustained by reason or history. History shows only this, that the limitations upon the exercise of the right of voting are the results of conventions. The natural social right is the right of the family to speak in all matters which concern the welfare of the family as one family in the great society and family of man.

This demonstrates, I think, that the negro has everywhere the same right to vote as the white man. And I maintain still further, that when you proceed one step from this line you admit that your Government is a failure. What is the essential quality of monarchical and aristocratic government? Simply that by conventionalities, by arrangements of conventions, some persons have been deprived of the right of voting. We have attempted to set up and maintain a Government upon the doctrine of the equality of man, the universal right of all men to participate in the Government. In accordance with that theory we must accept the ballot upon the principle of equality. It is enjoyed by the learned and the unlearned, the wise and the ignorant, the virtuous and the vicious.

The great experiment is going on. If, before the war, any man in this country was disposed to undervalue a Government thus conducted, he should have learned by this time the wisdom and the strength of a Government which embraces and embodies the judgment and the will of the whole people. If the negroes of the South, four million strong, had been endowed with the elective franchise, and had united with the white people of that region in the work of rebellion, your armies would have been powerless to subdue that rebellion, and you would to-day have seen your territory limited by the Potomac and the Ohio.

And if, in the North, suffrage had been limited, as it is in Great Britain, you could not have commanded two million six hundred thousand volunteers for the defense of the Republic. The unity of sentiment in the loyal States was due to the fact that every man felt that the Government was his own. This only illustrates how strong a Government is when it is founded upon the judgment and the will of the whole people, and how weak it is when founded upon the judgment and the will of a part.

I advance still further. I have said that I consider this question as involving other issues than the mere matter of suffrage in the District of Columbia. I do not conceal my opinion from friend or opponent. I am of those who believe that any restoration of either of the eleven States lately engaged in the rebellion to political power in the Government of this country, which is not coupled with or preceded by the condition that the negroes of the South are to vote, opens a way to the destruction of this Government from which there is no escape. I declare, after the gravest deliberation and the calmest reflection, and I say it with sorrow, looking upon the country, rent by opposite opinions on this question, that, without such a measure as I suggest for the southern States, this Government cannot outlast those who are now in the vigor of manhood. Why and how will it fail?

It will fail and fall from the fact that by restoration without this all-essential guarantee we put into the hands of our enemies in the South two weapons, the blows of which we shall be powerless to parry. One is the assumption by the Government of a vast and overwhelming weight of indebtedness, to be followed by a foreign war. We see to-day how difficult it is to restrain and control the people of this country in their desire to take just vengeance for the wrongs inflicted upon them by England and France. Suppose the power of this Government was intrusted to the hands of the late slaveholders, the men recently engaged in rebellion. Does any man believe that they are restored to their right mind, that they will give an ardent support to the Government? All the testimony is that they are as alien and hostile to this Government as ever, and that they only seek an opportunity to strike a deadly blow.

What opportunity do you give them? They are marshaling to-day in Virginia, in South Carolina, in Louisiana, their claims upon this Government. They will demand $2,000,000,000 for slaves, untold hundreds of millions of dollars for depredations committed by our armies. An aggregate of thousands of millions of claims, or demands having the color of claims, will be marshaled against the Government; and you invite sixty Representatives, united, bound together by the ties of interest and of ancient and unrelenting hostility, to enforce these claims. This Congress, no doubt, is incorruptible; but when there are claims against the Government to the amount of $8,000,000,000, with the support that such representatives may afford, twenty-two in the Senate and sixty in this House, with all the influence of this immense demand against the Government, do you expect to resist them? Do you expect to meet them with a paper blockade, constitutional amendments? If that is your expectation, your expectation will not be realized; and when they have involved the country in an indebtedness of four, five, or six thousand million dollars, when they have broken your credit so that in the markets of the world your paper will sell for fifty cents on the dollar, and, taking advantage of the just and natural hostility of the people against European aggression, they involve you in a foreign war, what have they to do but to march out of the Union and bid you defiance?

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the loyal man of Louisiana, or of any State of the South who has never been in the rebellion, who has resisted it from the beginning and done all he could against it, is not entitled to damages as any man from Massachusetts or any other loyal State of the Government?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not reply to that question, because it is not pertinent to the debate I am now engaged in. I only ask the House to notice how pregnant is the suggestion itself of argument in support of the view I am presenting of the dangers of restoration to the elective franchise in the hands of our enemies exclusively.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know that it is pertinent to the result the gentleman proposes to come to, but it is to the position he has assumed and the argument he has presented.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Secondly, you leave the rebels in possession of a power which they will surely avail themselves of when they again undertake the destruction of the Government—the opportunity to bestow the elective franchise upon the negroes. If you fail to secure the black man in his rights, he will become in a degree alien and hostile to the national Government. In this condition he will be ready to accept the right of suffrage from the southern leaders, and transfer his allegiance, sympathy, and support from you to them. Will you leave such a weapon in the power of your enemies, when, by a timely act of justice, you can secure the zealous and unwavering support of the black race in every generation? Throughout this contest the blacks have exhibited the purest patriotism and the highest wisdom. Can any man name an act done by them that has been injurious to them as a race or prejudicial to the country? Or can any one suggest an omission that has been prejudicial to them or to the country? So will they exhibit wisdom hereafter. If we fail in our duty, we have no right to expect their support in the future.

It is not unreasonable to expect that in twelve or twenty-four months several of the States recently in rebellion will confer the elective franchise upon their negroes. In Louisiana one eighth of the voting white population, I understand, are in favor of that measure. We know that this force must be augmented by accessions of loyal men, and for this reason—every Union man in the South who wants protection for life, for property, and for his own political rights, is compelled by necessity to ally himself with the negroes. They are his friends, and he must make common cause with his friends, whether they be white or black.

My chief objection to this proposed restriction is, that the rebel States are not likely to do anything more for themselves than you do for the country when you pass judgment and establish your policy here. If you put a limitation or qualification upon the exercise of the elective franchise, who does not see that its enforcement is a question of administration? And herein there is a difference between Massachusetts and this District; there is a difference between Massachusetts and Louisiana. Our inspectors and examiners are in favor of suffrage, and they desire to give every man the elective franchise. Every doubt is given to the applicant. In South Carolina and Alabama it is a question of administration; and do you suppose the men who will preside and decide this question will come to the conclusion that a negro can read when the result is that he must also vote? Will they accept testimony that he has been in the Army when they do not want his ballot brought to bear against them, as his bayonet frequently was during the war? Do you suppose they will tax him when they know that taxation gives him the power to interfere in the Government? More than that, I do not suppose that the colored men in this District would be safe in coming to the polls. I am pretty sure that in the old slave States you would have to muster the entire black male population, so that they might go to the polls in safety.

I have thus given, with less preparation than I ought to have made for the discussion of a question like this, the views I entertain upon this subject. But beyond this, when we proclaimed the emancipation of the slaves, and put their lives in peril for the defense of this country, we did in effect guaranty to them substantially the rights of American citizens and a Christian posterity, and heathen countries will demand how we have kept that faith.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] I desire to make a single inquiry. It is this: I understand the bill, as reported from the Judiciary Committee, proposes to strike out the word "white" from all laws relating to the District, so that, according to the law, each citizen shall have the right to vote. Now, I wish to know whether the effect of the bill will be to submit to the officers holding the elections in this District the right to decide, under and in the light of the Dred Scott decision, that no man can vote as a citizen who is of African descent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that it is settled by recent authorities that the word "citizen" embraces black persons as well as white.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman does not apprehend my inquiry. The authorities of this District, we all know, will regard the decision in the Dred Scott case as law; and if it is law, then no person of African descent will be permitted to vote under the provisions of this bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very likely the gentleman is right. I am addressing myself to the expediency of putting a qualification to the exercise of the right of suffrage in this District, and but one thought further remains, on the discussion of which I was just entering when interrupted by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, we are to answer for our treatment of the colored people of this country. and it will prove in the end impracticable to secure to men of color civil rights unless the persons who claim those rights are fortified by the political right of voting. With the right of voting everything that a man ought to have or enjoy of civil rights comes to him. Without the right to vote he is secure in nothing. I cannot consent, after all the guards and safeguards which may be prepared for the defense of the colored men in the enjoyment of their rights—I cannot consent that they shall be deprived of the right to protect themselves. One hundred and eighty-six thousand of them have been in the Army of the United States. They have stood in the place of our sons and brothers and friends. They have fallen in defense of the country. They have earned the right to share in the Government; and if you deny them the elective franchise I know not how they are to be protected. Otherwise you furnish the protection which is given to the lamb when he is commended to the wolf.

There is an ancient history that a sparrow pursued by a hawk took refuge in the chief assembly of Athens in the bosom of a member of that illustrious body, and that the senator in anger hurled it violently from him. It fell to the ground dead, and such was the horror and indignation of that ancient but not Christianized body—men living in the light of nature, of reason—that they immediately expelled the brutal Areopagite from his seat, and from the association of humane legislators.

What will be said of us, not by Christian, but by heathen nations even, if, after accepting the blood and sacrifices of these men, we hurl them from us and allow them to be the victims of those who have tyrannized over them for centuries? I know of no crime that exceeds this; I know of none that is its parallel; and if this country is true to itself it will rise in the majesty of its strength and maintain a policy, here and everywhere, by which the rights of the colored people shall be secured through their own power—in peace the ballot, in war the bayonet.

It is a maxim of another language, which we may well apply to ourselves, that where the voting register ends the military roster of rebellion begins; and if you leave these four million people to the care and custody of the men who have inaugurated and carried on this rebellion; then you treasure up for untold years the elements of social and civil war which must not only desolate and paralyze the South, but shake this Government to its very foundation.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, without instituting any inquiry or comparison between the black and white races, I wish simply to indicate my reasons for the vote which I expect to give on the bill now pending.

I believe that all history will sustain the position that only a homogeneous people can make a united nation.

I further believe that the effort to introduce into the sovereignty of this country a race which cannot in the nature of things become homogeneous—which fact every instinct of our humanity and the whole legislation of the country attest—can only be productive of contention and conflict—a conflict which must ultimately result in the domination of one or the other of these races, and the ultimate destruction of the weaker race.

And this rule I would apply not only to the negro, but to the Indian, the Chinaman; and if there be any people of our own race of whom it could not fairly be predicated that in a few generations they would become homogeneous, or, in other words, Americanized, I would, if I had the power, deny to that people the right of suffrage.

On the other hand, I would by the fullest legislation secure not only to the negro, but to every inhabitant of this country, of whatever race or lineage, all the protection that the law gives to my wife or minor son, and I would do this not only in the District of Columbia, but in every State of the Union.

I would in the present circumstances of our country go further, and, departing somewhat from the rule laid down, I would as a special recognition of his services to the Commonwealth in its hour of trial, extend the right of suffrage to every man of whatever race who has in the war for the Union faithfully served in and been honorably discharged from the naval or military service of the United States. But in no case would I extend this right so far as to give to the excluded race the control of the government in any community, and thus provoke the conflict I seek to avoid.

With this brief statement I indicate my intention of voting against the bill under consideration, and also against the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The motion upon which the House will be called to vote is that submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DARLING] yesterday, to postpone the consideration of this bill until the first Tuesday in April. I do not propose to discuss that motion. It is made by the gentleman in antagonism to the exercise of the right of suffrage by any person in this District, and in order that we may determine whether the House is in favor of the proposition to deprive all men of the right to vote in this District, I demand upon that motion the previous question.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it in order now to move to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. NIBLACK. I make that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 123, not voting 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chandler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shandlin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Voorhees, and Winfield—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perkins, Pike, Plants, Pomerooy, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—123.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Benjamin, Culver, Dumont, Harris, Hotchkiss, James R. Hubbell, McIntoe, McKuer, Newell, Rousseau, Whaley, and Wright—12.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HIGBY stated that Mr. McKUER was detained from the House by sickness, and had been for two or three days past.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York, stated that Mr. Hotchkiss was detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on Mr. DARLING's motion to postpone.

Mr. DARLING. I will modify my motion so as to make the time the first Tuesday in March instead of the first Tuesday in April.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I understand it, the previous question will exhaust itself on the motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. It will exhaust itself on the motion to postpone.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROGERS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 135, not voting 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Banks, Conkling, Darling, Davis, DeForest, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, James Humphrey, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Marvin, Mercer, Miller, Orth, Phelps, William H. Randall, Raymond, Smith, Stillwell, John L. Thomas, Trimble, and Robert T. Van Horn—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Haynes, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulbard, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—135.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Buckland, Culver, Delano, Dumont, Harris, Hotchkiss, James R. Hubbell, McIndoe, McKuer, Newell, Rousseau, Whaley, and Wright—13.

So the motion to postpone was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now demand the previous question on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would ask that those instructions be read.

They were read, as follows:

Recommit with an instruction to the committee to amend the bill so as to extend the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia to all persons coming within either of the following classes, irrespective of caste or color, but subject only to existing provisions and qualifications other than those founded on caste or color, to wit:

1. Those who can read the Constitution of the United States.
2. Those who are assessed for and pay taxes on real or personal property within the District.
3. Those who have served in and been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States.

And to restrict such right of suffrage to the classes above named, and to include proper provisions excluding from the right of suffrage those who have borne arms against the United States during the late rebellion, or given aid and comfort to said rebellion.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] allow me to propose an amendment to those instructions?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will hear the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to strike out this clause of the instructions:

2. Those who are assessed for and pay taxes on real or personal property within the District.

And then I shall move to insert the following in its proper place:

Provided, however, That no loyal citizen of said District now having the right to vote therein shall be disfranchised.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot agree to that. I will permit the gentleman to make the motion to strike out.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we will not make these instructions any better than they are; they are bad enough at best.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will move to amend these instructions by striking out the property qualification.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now call the previous question. I will say that I modified my motion to recommit by accepting as a part of it the amendment moved by the member from New York [Mr. HALE] to recommit with certain instructions. I stated yesterday when I agreed to accept that amendment that I should myself oppose it and vote against it. But I accept it as a modification of my own motion, so as to save the taking of one vote. And I have also consented that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should submit his motion to amend the instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire whether my colleague [Mr. HALE] cannot accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to his amendment, although his amendment has been accepted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] would have the right to accept the amendment moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] cannot preclude him from the right of accepting a modification, for it is a personal right of the gentleman from New York who moved these instructions, although the gentleman from Iowa, in order to save time, has accepted them as a part of his own motion.

Mr. HALE. I cannot accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] Mr. BENJAMIN. Are not those various propositions divisible?

The SPEAKER. They are not; a motion to recommit with instructions is not divisible.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to state merely that I have no disposition to prolong this discussion, and I desire to have this bill brought to a vote. The objections to these instructions which have occurred to my mind I will briefly state. In the first place, the most material objection is the one relating to the last instruction proposed to be sent to the committee, which reads as follows:

And to restrict the right of suffrage to the classes above named—that is, to "those who can read the Constitution of the United States," "those who are assessed for and pay taxes on real or personal property within the District," and "those who have served in and been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States." It will be observed by every member of the House that if these instructions are given to the committee, it will be a vote on the part of the House in favor of depriving even loyal white men of the right of voting in this District, if they do not come within one of these qualifications.

Now, notwithstanding I accepted these instructions as a part of my motion, I stated at the time that I should oppose the motion, although made by myself. This is now in a shape that I do not see how any man can justify himself in voting to recommit with these instructions, when it would deprive even loyal white men in the District of the right to vote, to say nothing of its effects on the blacks.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to address an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.]

[Cries of "Order! "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who reported this bill, having concluded his remarks in close of the debate, further debate is not now in order.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon recommitting the bill with the instructions proposed by Mr. HALE, as amended on motion of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 117, not voting 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Banks, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferry, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Haynes, Henderson, Hooper, Hulbard, James Humphrey, Jenckes, Kasson, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McKee, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, and Winfield—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Mercur, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—116.

ger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—117.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Culver, Dumont, Harris, Hotchkiss, James R. Hubbell, McIndoe, McKuer, Newell, Pike, Rousseau, Whaley, and Wright—12.

So the House refused to recommit the bill with the proposed instructions.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the final passage of the bill,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the previous question.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for one moment that I may offer an amendment. [Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no."] It is simply to provide that at least one year's actual residence in the District of Columbia shall be necessary to entitle a person to vote.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to amend the bill at this stage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 64, not voting 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Haynes, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Benjamin, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McKee, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, and Winfield—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Culver, Dumont, Harris, Hotchkiss, James R. Hubbell, McIndoe, McKuer, Newell, Rousseau, John L. Thomas, Whaley, and Wright—12.

So the bill was passed.

The announcement of the result was greeted in the galleries and on the floor with loud demonstrations of applause, which the Speaker was for some time unable to check.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to gentlemen of the House that it is useless for him to attempt to enforce order in the galleries if members will not observe their own rules.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask leave of absence indefinitely for my colleague, Mr. DELANO, who has been called to his home by a death in his family.

Leave was granted.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask leave of absence for myself until Tuesday next.

Leave was granted.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the petition of Alexander J. Atocha, in which he refers to his claim against Mexico now pending before the Court of Claims, and suggests reasons why, under present laws and the regulations of that court, no adequate justice can be there done the petitioner, and he asks therefore for further relief. If there be no objection, this petition will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

It was so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of Rev. William H. Lee, and several hundred others, citizens of the District of Columbia, asking Congress to strike out the word "white" from the qualifications for suffrage in the District of Columbia. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADE. Let it lie on the table. The committee have already reported a bill on that subject.

Mr. WILSON. As the committee have reported on the subject, I change my motion, and move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of residents of the District of Columbia, calling upon Congress to declare null and void all laws and parts of laws which make qualifications or distinctions on account of color. I also have a second petition of the same character. One of these is signed, I understand, by the editors of one of the leading journals of this city, and all the persons in their employ. I ask the reference of these two petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It was so ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of enlisted men of company G, eighth regiment United States Veteran volunteers, praying for the payment to them of $400 each, being bounty money alleged to have been lost through the carelessness or fraud of H. G. Loring, late recruiting officer, holding a commission as major in the fifth regiment United States Veteran volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of G. M. Gouler, widow of Charles Gouler, late a private soldier in company F, ninth regiment New Hampshire volunteers, who was drowned in the Delaware river on the 24th of October, 1864, while absent from hospital on leave, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Kate Pettit, praying for relief for injuries alleged to have been received by her in July last while walking on the sidewalk in the city of Georgetown, District of Columbia, in consequence of the carelessness of the driver of a Government team; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of George D. C. Hibbs, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Ericsson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 87) for the relief of certain volunteer officers appointed by the President; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 88) to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia; and a bill (H. R. No. 143) for the relief of Charles F. Anderson; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) for the relief of certain volunteer troops of Missouri who served during the war be printed.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I rise to present the certificate of the election of Hon. William Marvin to the Senate of the United States from the State of Florida. In doing so, I desire to say that, personally, I have known this gentleman for nearly thirty years; and to his character and high standing and loyalty to the United States during all this struggle it gives me great pleasure to bear testimony. His services as a judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida for many years are known to the country. His abilities as a judge in the administration of our laws and admiralty jurisdiction are known not only to this country, but to the world, for one of the best works ever published upon admiralty jurisdiction, and which is often quoted in the courts of England as well as our own, was written by him. He, sir—and it is with great pleasure that I can say it; and upon this point in my mind there is a very great distinction between the various cases—is capable and willing to take the oath which Congress has prescribed as being necessary to be taken by every member of either House when entering upon the discharge of legislative functions.

For myself, sir, I should be prepared at this moment to ask that he be sworn at once; and if the members of the Senate knew him as I know him, I can hardly conceive that there would be any objection. But, sir, from deference to the opinions of others who surround me, and who desire further to look into the question which concerns the States in which the insurrection existed, I shall not make that motion at this time, but intend to make a motion which, for the present, will dispose of this question. Before doing so, however, I desire to show the Senate what his course has been, and I can do it in no better form or clearer language than by quoting what was said by him when, as provisional governor, he was about to retire and surrender to the Governor-elect the administration of the affairs of the State of Florida. On that occasion he said:

"When I assumed the duties of provisional governor in this State, in the first days of August last, I found the civil government of the State overthrown and prostrate, and martial law everywhere prevailing. This was a painful, anomalous, and unnatural state of things."

"The Constitution of the United States guarantees to each State in the Union a republican form of government, and the chief object contemplated by the President in appointing for the State a provisional governor, under the circumstances of the case, was that the latter might make such rules and regulations as were necessary to enable the people of the State to assemble in convention, and, accepting the results of the war, adopt such measures as were necessary to re-establish a State government, republican in form, and restore the natural and normal relations of the State with the General Government."

"I entered upon the duties of my office with zeal and earnestness, and notwithstanding the difficulties to be encountered in consequence of the total absence of any mail facilities in many parts of the State, and very insufficient ones in others, yet the facilities so generously furnished me by Major General Foster, the commander of the military department of the State, enabled me to distribute, through military couriers, the proclamation and poll-books for an election; and an election was held on the 10th day of October in every county of the State for delegates to a convention. The convention assembled at the capitol in this city on the 25th day of the same month, all the counties but two being fully represented. The aggregate vote of the State was six thousand seven hundred and seven, being considerably more than one half of the votes usually polled at a general election in times of party contests, and this, too, notwithstanding ing in very many counties no opposing candidates were run. The convention, therefore, represented the mass of the people, and the constitution adopted and the ordinances passed by that body are founded upon the consent of the people of the State, regularly expressed by and through their delegates duly elected."

"The convention incorporated into the constitution a clause declaring that 'neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall in future exist in this State, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been convicted by the courts of this State, and that all the inhabitants of the State, without distinction of color, are free, and shall enjoy the rights of person and property, without distinction of color; and that in all criminal proceedings founded upon an injury to a colored person, and in all cases affecting the rights and remedies of colored persons, no person shall be incompetent to testify as a witness on account of color.' It opened the courts of justice alike to all persons. It repudiated the State debt contracted in support of the rebellion and annulled the ordinance of secession. This action of the convention was at the time eminently satisfactory to me, and I have reason to believe has proved so to the President. It is under this constitution, the fundamental law of the State, that you"—

The Legislature whom he was addressing—"are now assembled, and the government is being organized. It is this constitution that you have sworn to support."

And, Mr. President, before I leave the floor and make the motion which I am about to submit, I desire to read also a statement made by the Governor-elect, into whose hands the administration of the State was then surrendered. Governor Walker said:

"Having spoken of the relations which ought to exist, and which for the most part do exist, among the white people of the States, I now naturally come to speak of the feelings which ought to be cherished and the policy which ought to be pursued toward our colored population."

"I think we are bound by every consideration of duty, gratitude, and interest, to make these people as enlightened, prosperous, and happy as their new situation will admit. For generations past they have been our faithful, contented, and happy slaves. They have been attached to our persons and our fortunes, sharing with us all our feelings, rejoicing with us in our prosperity, mourning with us in our adversity. If there were exceptions to this general rule, they were only individual exceptions. Every southern man who hears me knows that what I say is literally true in regard to the vast mass of our colored population. The world has never before seen such a body of slaves. For, not only in peace, but in war they have been faithful to us."

"During much of the time of the late unhappy difficulties, Florida had a greater number of men in the army, beyond her limits, than constituted her entire voting population. This, of course, stripped many districts of their entire arms-bearing inhabitants, and left our females and infant children almost exclusively to the protection of our slaves. They proved true to their trust. Not one instance of insult, outrage, or indignity has ever come to my knowledge. They remained at home and made provisions for our army. Many of them went with our sons to the army, and there, too, proved their fidelity, attending them when well, nursing and caring for them when sick and wounded. We all know that many of them were willing, and some of them anxious, to take up arms in our cause. Although for several years within sound of the guns of the vessels of the United States, for six hundred miles along our sea-board, yet scarcely one in a thousand voluntarily left our agricultural service to take shelter and freedom under the flag of the Union. It is not their fault that they are free; they had nothing to do with it; that was brought about by 'the results and operations of the war.'"

"But they are free. They are no longer our contented and happy slaves, with an abundant supply of food and clothing for themselves and families, and the intelligence of a superior race to look ahead and make all necessary arrangements for their comfort. They are now a discontented and unhappy people, many of them houseless and homeless, roaming about in gangs over the land, not knowing one day where the supplies for the next are to come from; exposed to the ravages of disease and famine; exposed to the temptations of theft and robbery, by which they are too often overcome; without the intelligence to provide for themselves when well, or to care for themselves when sick, and doomed to untold sufferings and ultimate extinction unless we intervene for their protection and preservation. Will we do it? I repeat, we are bound to do it by every consideration of duty, gratitude, and interest."

"Much has been said of late about the importation of white labor from Germany, Ireland, Italy, and other countries, and with proper limitations and restrictions I am in favor of it; but let us always remember that we have a laboring class of our own which is entitled to the preference. It is not sufficient to say that white labor is cheaper. I trust we are not yet so far degraded as to consult interest alone. But interest alone would dictate that it is better to give these people employment, and enable them to support themselves, than have them remain upon our hands as a pauper race; for here they are, and here, for weal or woe, they are obliged to stay. We must remember that these black people are natives of this country, and have a pre-emption right to be the recipients of whatever favors we may have to bestow. We must protect them, if not against the competition, at any rate against the exactions of white immigrants. They will expect our black laborers to do as much work in this climate as they have been accustomed to see white ones perform in more northern latitudes. We know that they cannot do it. They never did it for us as slaves, and the experience of the last six months shows that they will do no better as freedmen. Our fathers of 1783 knew that it takes five black men to do the work of three white ones, and consequently, in adjusting the apportionment of taxes upon the basis of the labor and industry of the country, eleven of the thirteen States of the old Confederation recommended that every five blacks be counted as only three. The same rule was afterward adopted in the Constitution of 1787 in regard to representation. But I fear those who may migrate hither from Europe or elsewhere will be unmindful of this fact. We ought not to forget it, and between foreign and black labor we ought always to give the preference to the latter when we can possibly make it available. And if we can offer sufficient inducements, I am inclined to think that the black man, as a field laborer in our climate, will prove more efficient than the imported white.

We ought to encourage our colored people to virtue and industry by all the means in our power. We ought to protect them in all their rights, both of person and property, as fully as we do the whites.

This is the view taken by our recent State convention. After recognizing the fact that they are free, and declaring that slavery shall never hereafter exist in the State, they proceeded to open to them all the courts of justice, and admit them as witnesses in all criminal proceedings founded upon an injury to a colored person, and in all cases affecting the rights and remedies of a colored person.

"I trust, gentlemen, that this action meets your approbation, and that you will take great care, not only not to discriminate in your legislation against the colored race, but that you will so shape your enactments as to promote their welfare and happiness to the fullest possible extent."

Mr. President, as I said before, for myself, knowing as well as I do the person who has received this certificate of election, I would be willing at once to move, and I think other Senators if they knew him as well as I do and his course and bearing during the whole conduct of this war, would be willing at once to vote, for his being permitted to be sworn. But, sir, as I have said, in deference to some of our friends around me who desire still further time to look into the question of the relation of these States and their condition to choose representatives in this body or to the other House, I will not make this motion now. I therefore simply move that this certificate do, for the present, lie upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish the Senator would withdraw his motion for one moment that I may have an opportunity to make a brief explanation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to discuss the question that arises on the presentation of these credentials, and I may say that there are many reasons for the expression of personal respect toward the gentleman who now appears as a Senator from Florida. In many respects—not in all respects, unhappily—he has done well in the situation where he was placed. I say unhappily not in all respects, for no person can read his speeches and say that in all respects he has done what a governor of one of those States at this time should have done. But I have no desire to discuss his particular case.

The Senator has alluded, however, to the actual condition of things in Florida. I wish to call attention to the actual condition of things there, as it is represented to me by thoroughly competent witnesses whose character is vouched to me by the first citizens of that State. I read passages from one letter dated in Florida, but I decline to mention the town in the State, December 14, 1865, as follows:

"The election has been held, and, as you may expect, rebels elected. The Legislature are four fifths rebel officers, from Brigadier General Joseph Finigan down to a corporal. General Barney has not yet obtained his pardon."

"The people of Florida are more hostile than they ever have been. They were surrendered too soon."

"I have found out, and ascertained to a certainty, the programme of the southern States, should they be fortunate enough to get into Congress. It is as follows:

"First. They are to repudiate the national debt in toto.

"Second. They are to pay all the southern slave-owners for all their negroes emancipated by the President's proclamation.

"Third. They are to stop all pensions now given to Union soldiers, their widows and orphans, unless a like pension is given to the confederate soldiers, their widows and orphans.

"Fourth. No officer or any leading rebel shall be punished for his treason against the Government.

"This would be a nice state of things, and would damn the country. I tell you honestly I should shudder at the result."

The letter then goes on to make a communication to which on another occasion I felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate. The writer says:

"I am advised that certain parties here intend to make a business of importing negroes to Cuba. It is said that there have gone two vessel-loads of them already."

That is the testimony of one citizen of Florida written from that State with regard to what is passing before his own eyes. Here is the testimony of another citizen, written December 4, 1865:

"I suppose your good people think this accursed rebellion is now crushed, and that all is 'peace and quiet' down South; but allow me to inform you that such is not the case, and the only hope of the Union men now is vested in the next Congress. Will they go in and admit these States back and allow them their former rights at once? If so, the whole country is ruined."

"Can you not bring influence to bear on your delegation to keep us under military surveillance for a few years, and has not Congress the power to disfranchise forever these leading rebels? President Johnson has enfranchised them, which virtually disfranchises us. As an instance, the vote of a loyal man (a deserter from rebellion) was challenged a few days since at the election in Lake City for State and county officers, also Representatives to Congress. Is that the way that loyal men are to be treated and abandoned by their Government? If so, I have no faith in the Government. Some say that the President is just giving them rope to hang themselves with, but he is paying it out too long to suit us here. Let him withdraw the troops from this State, and it would not be safe for a Yankee or deserter to travel through the country."

There, sir, is testimony direct from Florida with regard to the actual condition of things in that State. Added to that, we have the constitution itself which this recent pretended convention has undertaken to put forward—a constitution which, after recognizing the abolition of slavery and therefore the citizenship of those who were once slaves, proceeds actually to decree their disfranchisement; and Senators are expected to recognize such an instrument as a republican form of government—an instrument which begins by the denial of equality to nearly one-half of its citizens! The question is now entirely changed since the abolition of slavery, for all are now citizens, and I insist, and at a proper time shall argue the question in this body, that no State among these States where the governments have lapsed can be recognized as republican in form which disfranchises any considerable portion of the citizens.

I am perfectly willing that these credentials shall lie upon the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One word in reply—

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend his remarks, and the Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. GRIMES. My point of order is, that this whole debate is out of order from the commencement of the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin, which was unprecedented, at any rate in this body, down to the last words that were uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts. If upon the presentation of credentials here, we are to have a debate upon all these questions of reconstruction and eulogiums upon the gentlemen named in them, we shall take up the whole time of the Senate during the session. As I understand it, there is no motion before the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin went on and made a speech, stating that he was going to make a motion to lay the credentials upon the table. He concluded his speech by making that motion, and then withdrew it, and we stand now exactly where we were when the Senator first rose without making any motion at all. I move that the credentials lie upon the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe it is not out of order for me, in rising to make a motion, to state my purpose in making the motion, if no one objects, if I conclude with making the motion, as I did in this case. I withdrew the motion at the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, for the purpose of allowing him to make his statement, so that I certainly was not out of order. I made the motion before any objection was made by the Senator from Iowa that I was out of order. It is true, I withdrew it to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator went on and made a speech without making any motion; there was nothing at all before the Senate. He told us he was going to make a motion, and just before he sat down he did make a motion, and then withdrew it. All the remarks, therefore, that the Senator made were out of order, because there was nothing pending before the Senate; and that is the condition we are in at this moment; there is nothing pending before the Senate. The Senator has sent to the table the credentials of a gentleman claiming to represent the State of Florida. We all agree with him, I suppose, as to the qualifications and character of this gentleman who comes here from Florida; but I want to have this matter disposed of, for one, precisely as we dispose of similar cases, and not have the whole morning hour consumed in a discussion of this sort.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will give his views on the point of order. There is no question before the Senate on which debate can legitimately arise. The motion now is that the document which has been introduced be laid upon the table.

Mr. GRIMES. I make that motion.
Mr. CLARK. And that motion is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1) extending the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to change the name of the ship Art Union to the name George M. Barnard—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. No. 143) for the relief of Charles F. Anderson—to the Committee on Public Buildings.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions, which was once before the Senate and delayed until we could get the letter of the Secretary of the Interior accompanying it printed. That letter we now have, and I suppose the disposition of the bill will not consume five minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that bill coming up if it is likely to be disposed of before the morning hour expires, but at that hour another bill is in order, which I hope we may proceed with the consideration of.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have no doubt that this bill can be passed in five minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the motion if the bill can be disposed of before one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior accompanying the bill, and showing its propriety and necessity, may be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 23, 1865.

Sir: I have the honor to return herewith the Senate resolution of the 18th instant, instructing the Committee on Pensions to inquire as to the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of pension agents by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to report by bill or otherwise, which you referred to me with a request for my opinion on the subject, and for the form of a bill, should I deem the introduction of one necessary.

In reply, I have the honor to state that, in my opinion, the proposed change in the manner of establishing pension agencies and of appointing the agents is both expedient and necessary. This power was conferred upon the Secretary of War by an act of Congress passed in the year 1836, and since the creation of this Department has continued to be exercised by the Secretary of the Interior. At that time the pension rolls were small, and the expenditures of the Government on that account, compared with those at the present time, were quite insignificant. Until quite recently the disbursements at many of the agencies were so small as not to afford sufficient inducements to persons to accept the appointment of pension agent, and the Department experienced considerable difficulty in providing for the payment of pensions in some localities. Now the amounts disbursed at many of the agencies reach to several hundred thousand dollars per annum, rendering the offices very remunerative, and causing them to be sought after with much avidity. Every reasonable precaution should, therefore, be taken to guard against the selection of improper and unsuitable persons for the discharge of duties which have thus become so important and responsible, and no better one can be adopted than that which brings to the aid of the Executive the advice of the Senate. I therefore respectfully submit the accompanying draft of a bill for that purpose.

But little, if any, additional expense is involved; and as existing laws make adequate provision for the expenses of the agencies, and for the compensation of the agents, no further legislation is deemed necessary.

I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant,
JAMES HARLAN, Secretary.
Hon. HENRY S. LANE, Chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Senate of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether there ought not to be some limitation in this bill. As it is, it authorizes the appointment of any number of these officers. The President may, under it, appoint fifty in one State if he shall think proper. Is it not practicable to limit it to a certain number? I would also like to inquire what the fees are. I see by the letter of the Secretary that it is stated that adequate provision is made for the payment of these officers. A few years ago I had occasion to look into the pension laws with a view of ascertaining by what authority the Secretary of the Interior increased the number of pension agents. I was aware that he was appointing new agents in different parts of the country, and I searched the statutes, as I thought, very carefully, and although the Secretary in his letter refers to some statute, I failed to find any authority for the Secretary of the Interior to make these appointments. I have never been able to find it, and if the chairman of the Committee on Pensions will refer us to the statute which gave that authority I shall examine to see what its limitations are.

Further, it would seem to me that this bill is very broad and not sufficiently guarded. I have no objection to the object of the bill; I think it proper that appointments of this character should be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I think it proper also that the number of pension agents should be increased. I am not complaining that they were increased; but I failed to find the authority of law for it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If I understand the law upon this subject, it is just this: before the organization of the Department of the Interior pensions were paid under the rules and regulations of the War Department. In many instances special agents were appointed for the purpose; in others the cashiers of banks acted as agents. The whole business was done under the supervision of the War Department, and it had a discretion as to the number of districts and the number of agents to be appointed. On the organization of the Interior Department the whole business of pensions was transferred from the War Department to the Interior Department, with precisely the same discretion to appoint agents who should pay the pensions. The increased compensation is nothing. Suppose there is only one agent in the State of Illinois to-day, and he pays all the pensions, he gets a certain percentage upon the amount paid; that is all that he gets. If there are four agents, that percentage is divided among the four; so that the expense is not increased by the unlimited number of appointees, while the convenience of the people is greatly facilitated by it, because they are enabled to receive their pensions at a point nearer than they would if there was only one agent in a State.

There are now only forty-nine pension agents in the United States. I have in my hand a list of them and a statement of the amount of bonds now required of every agent. I do not think it is practicable to limit the discretion of the President as to the number of districts or the number of agents. There are some ten or eleven States which were lately in rebellion that now have no pension agents at all. The Secretary of the Interior thinks it very desirable, and so does the Commissioner of Pensions, that he should have discretion to establish agencies, for instance, in Tennessee and Alabama, at points where we have raised Union troops in the rebellious States, and I do not think it practicable to limit this discretion. While the payments were made by the Secretary of War he had full discretion as to the number of agents to be appointed; since it has been in the Interior Department the Secretary of the Interior has had precisely the same discretion; and, under this bill, the only change contemplated is that you give the power to the President and give a discretion to the President as to the number of agents, so that when an agent is appointed he has to be nominated to the Senate and pass the scrutiny of this body. I think it eminently proper that the bill should be passed, and I think it impracticable to limit the number of agents by legislation.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. One of the objects I had in offering the resolution which resulted in the presentation of this bill was to have the acting agents revised by the President and the Senate, and I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions what objection there was to so framing the bill as to have the nominations of the existing agents pass in revision before the President and Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The objection, as I understand, was just this: we have forty-nine pension agents who have given bonds ranging from $25,000 to $200,000. The Secretary of the Interior says he is perfectly satisfied that every single agent is honest, competent, and efficient, and he does not need any change in them. The Commissioner of Pensions assured the committee of precisely the same state of things. We did not think it proper to legislate out of office forty-nine good officers when neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Commissioner of Pensions desired any such thing; but we leave it to the President, and to the Secretary of the Interior on his recommendation, to revise the whole list and reappoint them all if he chooses; but in the mean time all these acting agents retain their offices. I find, too, that the bonds, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions, are sufficient. I have a list here of them all.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. What is the bond of the agent in Kansas?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Seventy-five thousand dollars is the amount of the bond of the agent in Kansas. They require a very high bond in Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois is a very good one. There ought to be at least some limit. If these offices are so remunerative, as the Secretary of the Interior in his letter indicates, there will of course be a great many applications, and I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that it be limited to one pension agent for each congressional district. That will give one to about one hundred and twenty-five thousand inhabitants. I believe that is about the right number.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have looked at the law of 1836, and I will read it:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to establish a pension agency at Pulaski, in the State of Tennessee, for the payment of all pensioners of the United States resident in the counties of Lincoln, Giles, Lawrence, and Wayne, in said State: Provided, That the establishment of such agency can be made without any charge to the United States."

How that can be construed to authorize the Secretary of War to appoint as many agents as he pleases I do not know; and although the powers of the Secretary of War in this respect have been transferred to the Secretary of the Interior, how it gave him that authority I cannot conceive. To show that such was not the intention of Congress, I will read another act passed in 1838:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to establish a pension agency at Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, for the payment of pensioners of the United States resident in the counties of Pickens, Sumter, Greene, Marengo, Perry, Bibb, Tuscaloosa, Jefferson, Walker, Fayette, Shelby, Randolph, and Talladega, in the State of Alabama: Provided, That no additional expense shall be incurred in the establishment of said pension agency."

Is it to be believed that the Congress of the United States went on year after year authorizing the establishment of a pension agency at each place where it was needed, while all the time the Secretary of War had authority to appoint as many agents as he pleased and where he pleased? I undertake to say that there is no statute authorizing the appointment of these pension agents ad libitum.

Now, I wish to ask of the Senator from Indiana another question. He says that it makes no difference to the United States how many pension agents there are, because they are paid by fees or by a percentage. Is it so that there is no limit to the amount of pay that these officers may receive? After this great war, when the number of our pensioners has been multiplied a hundred fold, and the amount of money necessary to pay them has swelled from hundreds of thousands to millions of dollars each year, is it so that these agents receive a percentage of one, two, or three per cent., amounting perhaps to ten, twenty, or fifty thousand dollars? If there be a limit, the Senate will readily perceive that it is a matter of material consequence how many pension agents you have; for if one pension agent does the business and cannot receive more than a certain amount for his pay, say $6,000, or $5,000, or whatever may be the limit, he would pay all the pensioners within a given district, and would receive no more than that sum, no matter what the percentage might amount to beyond it; while if there were half a dozen pension agencies within the same district and each received his $6,000, or whatever might be the sum fixed, it would cost the Government six times as much to pay the pensioners. I desire to know whether there is not a limit on the amount of pay that a pension agent may receive under the law as it now stands.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My impression is that the percentage is fixed by the Secretary of the Interior; I do not believe there is any law regulating the amount of the percentage. I understand the fact to be, however, that there are no pension agencies in the United States worth $3,000 a year. There is no single agency where the percentage amounts to that much, though in one office $600,000 a year is paid out. I understand that hardly any of the agencies exceed $2,500 a year.

The argument of the Senator from Illinois, that there is now no law regulating the appointment of these agents, is the very strongest possible reason why we should pass a law on the subject. The very thing contemplated by the bill before the Senate is to fix the manner of appointment. The only question is whether we had better limit the number. I think it impracticable and wholly useless to do so if we could, for if they are paid by a percentage they will only receive a certain proportion of the whole amount, whether it be paid by many or few agents. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] suggested that the number should be limited to one agent for each congressional district. That would be a beautiful limitation! One to each congressional district, when we now have only forty-nine for the whole United States! The complaint is that we have too many now; and therefore the number must be limited by appointing two hundred and forty-four! I do not see the force of that argument. We must leave the discretion somewhere, trusting and believing that no more will be appointed than the necessities of the country demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 60.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not able, Mr. President, to agree with the Committee on the Judiciary in its conclusion to recommend this bill to the favorable consideration of the Senate, and I had intended rather fully to examine its provisions, but find my health is such to-day that I shall not be able very fully to consider it. I intend, however, briefly to discuss what I think are the prominent features of the bill. It is entitled "A bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau." It should be entitled "A bill to enlarge the powers and extend the jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau," and then the title would accurately define the force of the bill. Upon the title itself, as indicating the purpose of the bill, I wish to ask Senators what are the reasons in favor of the enactment of this proposed law. Why shall we now extend the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau?

At the last session of Congress the original law creating that bureau was passed. We were then in the midst of the war; very considerable territory had been brought within the control of the Union troops and armies, and within the scope of that territory, it was said, there were many freedmen who must be protected by a bill of that sort; and it was mainly upon that argument that the bill was enacted. The Senate was very reluctant to enact the law creating the bureau as it now exists. There was so much hesitancy on the part of the Senate, that by a very large vote it refused to agree to the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] from a committee of conference, and I believe the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who introduced this bill, himself voted against that bill; and why? That bill simply undertook to define the powers and duties of the Freedmen's Bureau and its agents, and the Senate would not agree to confer the powers that that bill upon its face seemed to confer, and it was voted down; and then the law as it now stands was enacted in general terms. There was very little gained, indeed, by the Senate refusing to pass the first bill and enacting the latter, for under the law as it passed the Freedmen's Bureau assumed very nearly all the jurisdiction and to exercise all the powers contemplated in the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Now, sir, it is important to note very carefully the enlargement of the powers of this bureau proposed by this bill; and in the first place it proposes to make the bureau permanent. The last Congress would not agree to this. The bill that the Senate voted down did not limit the duration of the bureau and it was voted down, and the bill that the Senate agreed to provided that the bureau should continue during the war and only for one year after its termination. That was the judgment of the Senate at the last session. What has occurred since to change the judgment of the Senate in this important matter? What change in the condition of the country induces the Senate now to say that this shall be a permanent bureau or Department of the Government; when at the last session it said it should cease to exist within one year after the conclusion of the war? Why, sir, it seems to me that the country is now, and especially the southern States are now in a better condition than the Senate had reason to expect when the law was enacted. Civil government has been restored in almost all the southern States; the courts are restored in many of them; in many localities they are exercising their jurisdiction within their particular localities without let or hindrance; and why, I ask Senators, shall we make this bureau a perpetual and permanent institution of the Government when we refused to do it at the last session?

Mr. President, upon this subject I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the information that we have; and I intend first to read very briefly from the recent message of the President of the United States in reply to the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 12th of December. He says:

"I have the honor to state that the rebellion waged by a portion of the people against the properly constituted authorities of the Government of the United States has been suppressed; that the United States are in possession of every State in which the insurrection existed, and that, as far as could be done, the courts of the United States have been restored, post offices reestablished, and steps taken to put into effective operation the revenue laws of the country.

"As the result of the measures instituted by the Executive, with a view of inducing a resumption of the functions of the States comprehended in the inquiry of the Senate, the people in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, have reorganized their respective State governments, and are yielding obedience to the laws and Government of the United States with more willingness and greater promptitude than, under the circumstances, could reasonably have been anticipated. The proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for the abolition of slavery forever within the limits of the country has been ratified by each one of those States with the exception of Mississippi, from which no official information has yet been received; and in nearly all of them measures have been adopted or are pending to confer upon freedmen rights and privileges which are essential to their comfort, protection, and security."

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the latter part of the sentence, "and in nearly all of them," that is, in nearly all of the seceding States, "measures have been adopted or are now pending to confer upon freedmen rights and privileges which are essential to their comfort, protection, and security." The President of the United States informs us that the southern States themselves are adopting measures with a view to the protection and prosperity of the colored people, and this within so short a period after the close of the war, when we could scarcely have expected that the reorganization of the southern States would have gone so far, when we could scarcely have expected that the prejudices engendered by the war would have passed away to such an extent as that the southern States themselves would have taken this very important and desirable step.

In the same connection I wish to read very briefly from the report of General Grant. I know it is claimed that General Grant says in this report that the Freedmen's Bureau must be continued in the southern States. I wish Senators to observe precisely what sort of a Freedmen's Bureau General Grant says should be continued. He does not anywhere recommend the establishment of a despotism within the southern States such as this bill proposes. General Grant proposes simply that small garrisons shall be continued in the southern States until order and quiet are fully restored, and then that the troops shall be entirely withdrawn. Upon that subject I will read from his report. He is not complimentary to the bureau. It has been in existence some months, and I will read what General Grant says of it:

"I did not give the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau that attention I would have done if more time had been at my disposal. Conversations on the subject, however, with officers connected with the bureau lead me to think that, in some of the States, its affairs have not been conducted with good judgment or economy, and that the belief, widely spread among the freedmen of the southern States, that the lands of their former owners will, at least in part, be divided among them, has come from the agents of this bureau. This belief is seriously interfering with the willingness of the freedmen to make contracts for the coming year. In some form the Freedmen's Bureau is an absolute necessity until civil law is established and enforced, securing to the freedmen their rights and full protection. At present, however, it is independent of the military establishment of the country, and seems to be operated by the different agents of the bureau according to their individual notions. Everywhere General Howard, the able head of the bureau, made friends by the just and fair instructions and advice he gave; but the complaint in South Carolina was that when he left things went on as before."

Again, he says:

"The Freedmen's Bureau being separated from the military establishment of the country requires all the expense of a separate organization. One does not necessarily know what the other is doing, or what orders they are acting under. It seems to me this could be corrected by regarding every officer on duty with troops in the southern States as an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, and then have all orders from the head of the bureau sent through department commanders. This would create a responsibility that would secure uniformity of action throughout all the South; would insure the orders and instructions from the head of the bureau being carried out, and would relieve from duty and pay a large number of employees of the Government."

Now, sir, to understand what General Grant means, I will turn to another part of his report:

"Four years of war, during which law was executed only at the point of the bayonet throughout the States in rebellion, have left the people possibly in a condition not to yield that ready obedience to civil authority the American people have generally been in the habit of yielding. This would render the presence of small garrisons throughout those States necessary until such time as labor returns to its proper channel and civil authority is fully established. I did not meet any one, either those holding places under the Government or citizens of the southern States, who think it practicable to withdraw the military from the South at present. The white and the black mutually require the protection of the General Government."

This is all I need at present read from this report. And what, sir, are General Grant's views? First, that the bureau has not been well conducted; each agent has acted upon his own notions; there has been no uniformity of action; in many localities the agents have induced the blacks to believe that the lands of their former owners would be divided out among them. This impression, the General says, has induced the colored people to refuse to enter into contracts for labor the coming year. The bureau itself has prevented the adjustment of the labor of the South; has prevented that state of things which must take place before there can be entire quiet in those States.

Then, what is proposed? Not that we shall send out an army of civil officers to govern the southern States; but he proposes that in the southern States small garrisons shall be continued, not of colored troops, for he says that produces evil, but of white troops, until the civil law is fully established and the courts become fully organized to adjust the affairs of the people. I intended to read on this subject from the New York Tribune in reply to some letters which the Senator from Massachusetts has read to the Senate this morning. That paper says that, by many communications from the southern States, it is clear that things are in a very much better condition than was to be expected; that labor is returning to its channels; that peace is prevailing; and that harmony between the colored people and the whites will soon be the result of the present state of things. Intended reading from the article, but I find the paper is mislaid.

Then, sir, from this evidence that we have before us, the statement of facts by the President of the United States, the statement of facts by the Lieutenant General of the United States, after a visit into the southern States, what reason is there for the Senate to pass a bill enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, a bureau of altogether too much power now. It is important, I believe, if this bureau is to continue, that its powers shall be more accurately defined, because it seems now to do whatever it pleases. I believe it has extended its jurisdiction over States not within the provisions of the law. I believe Kentucky has been brought within the scope and sphere of its government, when the law did not contemplate it and did not allow it. I believe the District of Columbia has been made a province within its government and control, and I think the law did not contemplate or allow that.

Then, sir, this bill proposes that the bureau shall be permanent. I ask Senators, in the first place, if they are now, with the most satisfactory information that is before the body, willing to do that which they refused to do at the last session of Congress. We refused to pass the law when it proposed to establish a permanent department; shall we now, when the war is over, when the States are returning to their places in the Union, when the citizens are returning to their allegiance, when peace and quiet, to a very large extent, prevail over that country, when the courts are reestablished; is the Senate now, with this information before it, willing to make this a permanent bureau and department of the Government?

The next proposition of the bill is, that it shall not be confined any longer to the southern States, but that it shall have a government over the States of the North as well as of the South. I call the attention of the Senate to the third section of the law which it is proposed to amend:

"The President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an assistant commissioner for each of the States declared to be in insurrection, not exceeding ten in number, who shall, under the direction of the Commissioner, aid in the execution of the provisions of this act."

The commissioners may be appointed under the original law for each of the States that have been declared to be in a state of insurrection. The President and the bureau had no power to send commissioners into any State except a State that had been declared to be in a condition of insurrection. Now, what are the provisions of the bill before the Senate?

That the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States; and the President may divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, each containing one or more States, not to exceed twelve in number.

The old law allowed the President to appoint a commissioner for each of the States that had been declared to be in rebellion, one for each of the eleven seceding States, not to exceed ten in all. This bill provides that the jurisdiction of the bureau shall extend wherever within the limits of the United States refugees or freedmen have gone. Indiana has not been a State in insurrection, and yet there are thousands of refugees and freedmen who have gone into that State within the last three years. This bureau is to become a governing power over the State of Indiana according to the provisions of the bill. Indiana, that provides for her own paupers, Indiana, that provides for the government of her own people, may, under the provisions of this bill, be placed under a government that our fathers never contemplated, a government that must be most distasteful to freedmen.

I know it may be said that the bureau will not probably be extended to the northern States. If it is not intended to be extended to those States, why amend the old law so as to give this power? When the old law limited the jurisdiction of this bureau to the States that had been declared in insurrection, is it not enough that the bureau should have included one State, the State of Kentucky, over which it had no rightful original jurisdiction; and must we now amend it so as to place all the States of the Union within the power of this irresponsible sub-government? This is one objection that I have to the bill, and the next is the expense that it must necessarily impose upon the people. We are asked by the Freedmen's Bureau in its estimates to appropriate $11,745,050; nearly twelve million dollars for the support of this bureau and to carry on its operations during the coming year. I will read what he says:

It is estimated that the amount required for the expenditures of the bureau for the fiscal year commencing January, 1866, will be $11,745,050. The sum is requisite for the following purposes:

Salaries of assistant and sub-assistant commissioners.....	$17,500
Salaries of clerks.....	82,800
Stationery and printing.....	63,000
Quarters and fuel.....	15,900
Clothing for distribution.....	1,750,000
Commissary stores.....	410,250
Medical department.....	500,000
Transportation.....	1,980,000
School superintendents.....	21,000
Sites for school-houses and asylums.....	3,000,000
Telegraphing.....	18,000

Making in all the sum which I have mentioned. The old system under this law that was before the Commissioner when he made this estimate requires an expenditure to carry on its operations of nearly twelve million dollars, and that to protect, as it is called, and to govern four millions of the people of the United States, within a few millions of the entire cost of the Government under Mr. Adams's administration, when the population of the States had gone up to many millions. How is it that a department that has but a partial jurisdiction over the people shall cost almost as much for the management of four million people as it cost to manage the whole Government, for its Army, its Navy, its legislative and judicial departments, in former years? My learned friend from Kentucky suggests that the expenses under John Quincy Adams's administration were about thirteen million dollars. What was the population of the United States at that time

I am not prepared to state, but it was far above four millions. Now, to manage four million people is to cost the people of the United States, under the law as it stands, nearly as much as it cost the people to manage the whole affairs of the Government under the administration of Mr. John Quincy Adams.

This extraordinary expense to the people in a time when the public debt is a great burden to them would be a reason with me to vote to repeal the old law. Is it a reason to Senators why they shall add to the great expenditures of this bureau? What is the increase of expenditure which this bill provides for? The old bill provided for one Commissioner and ten assistant commissioners. This bill provides for the same Commissioner and twelve assistant commissioners. It also provides that the country shall be divided up into sub-districts, and an agent appointed for each district within the discretion of the bureau, each county and parish constituting a district. I ask the attention of the Senate while I read this section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, shall divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in each State,—

That will be a sub-district for every county and parish in the United States—and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, shall serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man, shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum; and such agent shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed in the first section of the act to which this is an amendment. Each assistant commissioner may employ not exceeding six clerks, one of the third class and five of the first class, and each agent of a sub-district may employ two clerks of the first class.

This bill provides for twelve assistant commissioners, and each assistant commissioner is to have six clerks; seventy-two in all. It then provides for a sub-agent in each county and parish of the country. How many will be appointed I cannot tell. The chairman of the committee that reported this bill cannot inform the Senate on that point. That will depend very much upon the political necessities of the Administration. If it shall be found important to increase the number of office-holders for political purposes, I do not choose to place the Treasury of the people under the possibility of such an influence. Whether agents shall be appointed in the counties of Indiana or in the counties of Ohio, where there are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of refugees and freedmen, I cannot say, nor can the Senator who reports this bill say. It is enough to know that an agent for each county and parish may be appointed at a salary of $1,500, and under him two clerks at $1,200 each, for each county and parish. I ask Senators, if under the old system it cost nearly twelve million dollars to carry on this bureau, how much will it cost under this new bill?

I hear Senators speak very frequently of the necessity of economy and retrenchment. Is this a specimen, increasing the number of officers almost without limit and increasing the expenditures? I think one might be safe in saying, that if this bill passes we cannot expect to get through a year with less than $20,000,000 of an expenditure for this bureau. But that is a mere opinion; for no man can tell until we have the number of officers that are to be appointed under the bill prescribed in the bill itself, and this section leaves the largest discretion to the bureau in the appointment of officers. I appeal to Senators to know whether at this time, when we ought to adopt a system of retrenchment and reform, they are willing to pass a bill which will so largely increase the public expenditures.

Then, sir, when this army of officers has been organized, the bill provides:

And the President of the United States, through the War Department, and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau.

Will some Senator be good enough to tell me what that means? If Indiana be declared a State within which are found refugees and freedmen who have escaped from the southern States, and if Indiana has a commissioner appointed to her, and if in each county of Indiana there be a sub-commissioner at a salary of $1,500 a year, with two clerks with a salary of $1,200 each, and then the War Department throws over this little army of office-holders in the State of Indiana its protection, what does that mean? The people of Indiana have been ground hard under military authority and power within the last three or four years, but it was borne because it was hoped that when the war would be closed that military power would be withdrawn from the State. Under this bill it may be established permanently upon the people by a body of men protected by the military power of the Government. An officer is appointed to the State of Indiana to regulate the contracts which are made between the white people and the colored people of that State, and because he holds this office, not military in its character, involving no military act whatever, the military throws over him its iron shield of protection. What does that mean? If this officer shall do a great wrong and outrage to one of the people, and the wronged citizen appeals to the court for his redress and brings his suit for damages, does the protecting shield of the War Department prevent the prosecution of that suit and the recovery of a judgment? What is the protection that is thrown over this army of office-holders? Let it be explained.

It may be said that this is a part of the military department. That will depend not so much upon what we call them in the law as what are the duties imposed upon these sub-agents. It is a little difficult to tell. They are to protect the freedmen; they are to protect refugees; they are to buy asylums and school-houses; they are to establish schools; they are to see to the contracts that are made between white men and colored men. I want to know of the chairman of the committee that reported this bill, in what respect these duties are military in their character? I can understand one thing, that it may be regarded as a war upon the liberties of the people, but I am not able to see in what respect the duties of these officers otherwise are military. But this protection is to be thrown over them. I will not occupy longer time upon that subject.

The third section of the bill changes the letter of the law in two respects, first:

That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation, &c.

Those last words, "medical stores and transportation," make the change in the law that is proposed in this bill. But, sir, in point of fact it makes no change in the law, for if you will turn to the report of the Commissioner of this bureau, it will be found that the bureau during the past six months has been furnishing medical supplies and transportation. A very large item in the expenditures estimated for is for transportation. But I wish to ask of the Senator who framed this bill why we shall now provide for the transportation of freedmen and refugees. During the war, a very large number of refugees came from the southern States into the North; but the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in his report says that those refugees have mainly returned, and but few remain now to be carried back from the North to the South, or who desire to be. Then why do we provide in this bill for transportation? Is it simply to give the bureau the power to transport refugees and freedmen from one locality to another at its pleasure? The necessity of carrying them from one section of the country to another has passed away. Is it intended by this bill that the bureau shall expend the people's money in carrying the colored people from one locality in a southern State to another locality? I ask the Senator from Illinois, when he comes to explain his bill, to tell us just what is the force and purpose of this provision.

The fourth resolution, as amended, provides for the setting apart of three million acres of the public lands in the States of Florida, Mis-

Mississippi, and Arkansas, for homes for the colored people. I believe that is the only provision of the bill in which I concur. I concur in what was said by some Senator yesterday, that it is desirable, if we ever expect to do anything substantially for the colored people, to encourage them to obtain homes, and I am willing to vote for a reasonable appropriation of the public lands for that purpose. I shall not, therefore, occupy time in discussing that section.

The next is the fifth section, in the following words:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the possessory titles granted in pursuance of Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed and made valid.

Yesterday that section was amended so as to provide that the possessory title should continue for three years from the date of the order. That order bears date at Savannah, Georgia, January 16, 1865. This section, as it now stands before the Senate, therefore, proposes to confirm the possessory right of the colored people upon these lands for three years from the date of that order, or about two years from this time. I like the amendment better than the original bill, for the original bill left it entirely uncertain what was confirmed, and of course it is better that we should say one year, or three years, or ten years, than to leave it entirely indefinite for what period we do confirm the possession. I have no doubt that General Sherman had the power as a military commander at the time to set apart the abandoned lands along the coast as a place in which to leave the colored people then surrounding his army; but that General Sherman during the war, or that Congress after the war, except by a proceeding for confiscation, can take the land permanently from one person and give it to another, I do not admit; nor did General Sherman undertake to do that. In express terms he said that they should have the right of possession, for what length of time he did not say, for the reason that he could not say. It was a military possession that he conferred, and that possession would last only during the continuance of the military occupation, and no longer. Upon this point I will read some authorities. First, I read from Phillimore's International Law, volume three, page 731:

"With respect to immovable private property, it has been already observed that the laws which relate to the effect of peace upon public and private property are in principle the same, and that the rule of international law is that the immovable property returns, on peace being made, to its original owner, unless there has been an express stipulation to the contrary.

"The conqueror dethrones the sovereign and assumes the dominion of the conquered territory; but as a general rule he does no more. It has been well laid down by the tribunals of the North American United States that the modern usage of nations, that large and important part of international law, would be violated, the sense of justice and of right, which is felt and acknowledged by the civilized world, would be outraged, if private property were generally confiscated and private rights annulled. The people, indeed, change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed."

Of course, the author is speaking of a war between two independent Powers, in which the one subjugates or conquers the other. Even in that case the military possession of real estate within the limits of a conquered country ceases when peace is made, unless the treaty stipulates otherwise. I will now read from Halleck's International Law, page 456, paragraph twelve:

"Private property on land is now, as a general rule of war, exempt from seizure or confiscation; and this general exemption extends even to cases of absolute and unqualified conquest. Even where the conquest of a country is confirmed by the unconditional relinquishment of sovereignty by the former owner, there can be no general or partial transmutation of private property in virtue of any rights of conquest. That which belonged to the Government of the vanquished passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in respect to the right of eminent domain; but private rights and private property, both movable and immovable, are in general unaffected by the operations of a war, whether such operations be limited to mere military occupation or extend to complete conquest. Some modern text-writers—Hautefeuille, for example—contend for the ancient rule, that private property on land is subject to seizure and confiscation. They are undoubtedly correct with respect to the general abstract right, as deduced from the law of nature and ancient practice; but while the general right continues, modern usage, and the opinions of modern text-writers of the highest authority, have limited this right by establishing the rule of general exemption. The private property of a sovereign is considered in the same light as that of any other individual."

I will now call the attention of the Senate to a paragraph from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the United States vs. Percheman, 7 Peters, page 86:

"It may not be unworthy of remark that it is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled. The people change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed. If this be the modern rule even in cases of conquest, who can doubt its application to the case of an amicable cession of territory?"

That is the rule, says Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of a complete, absolute conquest of territory by one independent Power from another, that the title of the private citizen is not disturbed, but that the public property passes to the new sovereign. Then, if General Sherman, by his General Order No. 15, placed the colored people upon the lands along the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, for a temporary purpose, what was the extent of the possessory right which he could confer? He did not undertake to give a title for any defined period, but simply the right of possession. It is fair to construe his order as meaning only what he could do, giving the right of possession during military occupancy. Now, sir, the President informs us that the rebellion is suppressed; that the war is over; that military law no longer governs in that country; but that peace is restored, and that civil law shall now govern. What, then, is the law upon the subject? A right of possession is given by the commanding general to certain persons within that region of country; peace follows, and with peace comes back the right of the real owners to the possession. This possession that the General undertook to give, according to law, could not last longer than the military occupancy. When peace comes, the right of the owners returns with it. Then how is it that Congress can undertake to say that the property that belongs to A, B, and C upon the islands and the sea-coast of the South shall, for two years from this date, not belong to them, but shall belong to certain colored people? I want to know upon what principle of law Congress can take the property of one man and give it to another.

I know very well what may be done in the courts by a proceeding for confiscation. I am not discussing that question. If there has been any property confiscated and disposed of under proceedings of confiscation, I do not question the title here. That is purely a judicial question. But, sir, I deny that Congress can legislate the property of one man into the possession of another. If this section is to pass, I prefer that this confirmation shall be for three years rather than leave it in the uncertain state in which General Sherman's order left it. I shall not further occupy the time of the Senate in regard to that section.

The sixth section, as amended, provides:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide, or cause to be erected, suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for the general purposes of this act, out of which payments for said lands shall be made. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands, from time to time, to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the preceding section at a price not less than the cost thereof to the United States.

This is a most extraordinary provision. I understand the doctrine to be that the constitutional amendment has been adopted, that the slaves have been made free, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] this morning intimated that the act of emancipation makes them citizens. Then here are four million people made free, according to his doctrine made citizens of the United States, as free as any Senator upon this floor, as free to contract, as free in every respect, I may say, as any of us, so far as their former relations are concerned. If they have been made free and brought into the class of citizens, upon what principle do we authorize the officers of the Government to buy homes for them? Upon what principle can you authorize the Government of the United States to buy lands for the poor people in any State of the Union? They may be very meritorious; their cases may appeal with great force to our sympathies; it may almost appear necessary to prevent suffering that we should buy a home for each poor person in the country; but where is the power of the General Government to do this thing? Is it true that by this revolution the persons and property of the people have been brought within the jurisdiction of Congress and taken from without the control and jurisdiction of the States? I have understood heretofore that it has never been disputed that the duty to provide for the poor, the insane, the blind, and all who are dependent upon society, rests upon the States, and that the power does not belong to the General Government. What has occurred, then, in this war that has changed the relation of the people to the General Government to so great an extent that Congress may become the purchasers of homes for them? If we can go so far, I know of no limit to the powers of Congress. Here is a proposition to buy a home for each dependent freedman and refugee. The section is not quite as strong as it might have been. It would have been stronger, I think, in the present state of public sentiment, if the word "refugee" had been left out, and if it had been only for the freedmen, because it does not seem to be so popular now to buy a home for a white man as to buy one for a colored man. But this bill authorizes the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau to buy homes for white people and for black people only upon the ground that they are dependent. If this be the law now, there has come about a startling change in the relation of the States and of the people to the General Government. I shall be very happy to hear from the learned head of the Judiciary Committee upon what principle it is that in any one single case you may buy a home for any man, whether he be rich or poor. The General Government may buy land when it is necessary for the exercise of any of its powers; but outside of that, it seems to me, there is no power within the Constitution allowing it.

But, sir, suppose that the constitutional power be possessed, is it well to authorize, in general terms, the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau to buy a home for each dependent refugee and freedman? It is said that there is a limitation in this section that they shall not buy these homes until after a general appropriation for the bureau has been made. Under that language, the head of the bureau could take any money appropriated for the bureau and apply it to the purchase of homes for the dependent freedmen and refugees. But what sort of a limit is that in these times, when deficiency bills run up to hundreds of thousands and to millions of dollars, when there is now lying upon our table a deficiency reported of about six hundred thousand dollars for the public printing—expenses incurred without authority of law? If the Printing Bureau can come with a strong demand upon Congress to meet its contracts made in advance of appropriations, why may not the Freedmen's Bureau do the same thing? And if lands are purchased under the necessities of the occasion, as the bureau may think, then if the Commissioner reports to Congress that so much is necessary to make up deficiencies, I apprehend a bill appropriating the necessary sum would pass. There is really no limit, therefore, upon this section.

A little while ago I spoke of the expenses of this bureau upon the people. At that time I did not include the cost of these purchases.

What will that be? How many farms are to be bought? How many homesteads in the villages? I know they are not to be given to the freedmen and refugees at once. These dependent people are to be placed in possession at a rent, and the Government of the United States is to become a landlord to this large class of people. It is to become a freeholder and landlord, renting out lands upon fixed terms to a portion of the population. Who ever heard of this Government occupying that relation to any portion of the people? And yet that is the provision of this bill. That is very different from the provision that we should set apart three million acres of the public lands for the benefit of these people. I am willing to do that, as we give homesteads to the white men, and encourage the settlement of the lands, and encourage their development if we can. (I doubt the development somewhat.) I do not object to giving them homes upon the public lands; but when we come to appropriating money to buy lands that the Government may become the landlord and thousands of people the tenants under it, it seems to me to be a very startling proposition. What will it cost? Under the old system, the expenses of the bureau amounted to nearly $12,000,000, and under this bill an army of officers is to be added to the system, and then comes this general proposition to buy homes, asylums, and schools for these people. In what instance, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has the Government of the United States gone into the States to buy lands and establish schools in a time of peace? During the war it was claimed that within the sphere of the operations of the Army almost anything could be done; but now, sir, we are in a state of peace; these States are within the Union; their civil governments have been restored. How is it that within these States we now propose to buy lands and erect school-houses? I know of no power conferred upon the General Government authorizing it.

The most remarkable sections of the bill, however, are the seventh and eighth, and to those sections I will ask the very careful attention of Senators; for I think if we can pass those two sections and make them a law, then indeed this Government can do anything. It will be useless to speak any longer of limitations upon the powers of the General Government; it will be idle to speak of the reserved power of the States; State rights and State power will have passed away if we can do what is proposed in the seventh and eighth sections of this bill. The seventh section is in these words:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against.

The language is very comprehensive. We propose, first, to legislate against the effects of "local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation;" then against "custom," and lastly, against "prejudice," and to provide that if "any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons" are denied to any person because of color, then that person shall be taken under the military protection of the Government. I do not know whether that will be understood to extend to Indiana or not. That will be a very nice point for the bureau to decide, I presume, after the enactment of the law. The section limits its operation to "any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion." It will be a little difficult to say whether in the State of Indiana and Ohio the ordinary course of judicial proceeding has or has not been interrupted. We had some war in Indiana; we had a very great raid through that State, and some fighting; and I presume that in some cases the proceedings of the courts were interrupted and the courts were unable to go on with their business, so that it might be said that even in some of the northern States this provision of the bill would be applicable. Suppose that it were applicable to the State of Indiana, then every man in that State who attempted to execute the constitution and laws of the State would be liable for a violation of the law. We do not allow to colored people there many civil rights and immunities which are enjoyed by the white people. It became the policy of the State in 1852 to prohibit the immigration of colored people into that State. I am not going to discuss the question whether that was a wise policy or not. At the time it received the approval of my judgment. Under that constitutional provision, and the laws enacted in pursuance of it, a colored man coming into the State since 1852 cannot acquire a title to real estate, cannot make certain contracts, and no negro man is allowed to intermarry with a white woman. These are civil rights that are denied, and yet this bill proposes if they are still denied in any State whose courts have been interrupted by the rebellion, the military protection of the Government shall be extended over the person who is thus denied such civil rights or immunities.

I understand, from the remarks of the Senator who introduced this bill, when he gave notice of its introduction, that he places the power of Congress to enact this law under the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery. I will consider that argument very briefly. That constitutional amendment was in these words:

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

It is claimed that under this second section Congress may do anything necessary, in its judgment, not only to secure the freedom of the negro, but to secure to him all civil rights that are secured to white people. I deny that construction, and it will be a very dangerous construction to adopt. The first section abolishes slavery. The second section provides that Congress may enforce the abolition of slavery "by appropriate legislation." What is slavery? It is not a relation between the slave and the State; it is not a public relation; it is a relation between two persons whereby the conduct of the one is placed under the will of the other. It is purely and entirely a domestic relation, and is so classed by all law writers; the law regulates that relation as it regulates other domestic relations. This constitutional amendment broke asunder this private relation between the master and his slave, and the slave then, so far as the right of the master was concerned, became free; but did the slave, under that amendment, acquire any other right than to be free from the control of his master? The law of the State which authorized this relation is abrogated and annulled by this provision of the Federal Constitution, but no new rights are conferred upon the freedman.

Then, sir, to make a contract is a civil right which has ordinarily been regulated by the States. The form of that contract and the ceremonies that shall attend it are not to be regulated by Congress, but by the States. Suppose that it becomes the judgment of the State that a contract between a colored man and a white man shall be evidenced by other solemnities and instruments than are required between two white men, shall not the State be allowed to make such a provision? Is it a civil right to give evidence in courts? Is it a civil right to sit upon a jury? If it be a civil right to sit upon a jury, this bill will require that if any negro is refused the privilege of sitting upon a jury, he shall be taken under the military protection of the Government. Is the right to marry according to a man's choice a civil right? Marriage is a civil contract, and to marry according to one's choice is a civil right. Suppose a State shall deny the right of amalgamation, the right of a negro man to intermarry with a white woman, then that negro may be taken under the military protection of the Government; and what does that mean? Under the seventh section, in such a case as that, when you have taken the negro under the military protection of the Government, perhaps sent a squad of men after him, what is then to be done when he is thus protected? What is meant by taking him under the protection of the Government? Does it mean that this military power shall enforce his civil right, without respect to the prohibition of the local law? In other words, if the law of Indiana, as it does, prohibits under heavy penalty the marriage of a negro with a white woman, may it be said a civil right is denied him which is enjoyed by all white men, to marry according to their choice, and if it is denied, the military protection of the colored gentleman is assumed, and what is the result of it all? I suppose they are then to be married in the camp of the protecting officer without regard to the State laws.

The next section of the bill provides punishments where any of these things are done, where any right is denied to a colored man which under State law is allowed to a white man. The language is very vague, and it is very difficult to say what this section will mean. If it has as broad a construction as is attempted to be given to the second section of the constitutional amendment, I would not undertake to guess what it means. The section is in these words:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of, and hear and determine all offenses committed against, the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe.

There, sir, is the court and the punishment. Any man who shall deny to any colored man any civil rights secured to white persons shall be liable to be taken before the officers of this bureau and to be punished according to the provisions of this section. In the first place, now that peace is restored, now that there is no war, now that men are no longer under military rule, but are under civil rule, I want to know how such a court can be organized; how it is that the citizen may be arrested without indictment and be brought before the officers of this bureau and tried without a jury, tried without the forms which the Constitution requires.

But, sir, this section is most objectionable in regard to the offense that it defines. If any portion of the law ought to be certain, it is that which defines crime and prescribes the punishment. What is meant by this general expression, "the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons?" The agent in one State may construe it to mean one thing, and the agent in another State another thing. It is broad and comprehensive—"the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons." That act of deprivation is the crime that is to be punished. Take the case that I have just referred to: suppose a minister when called upon should refuse to solemnize a marriage between a colored man and a white woman because the law of the State forbade it, would he then, refusing to recognize a civil right which is enjoyed by white persons, be liable to this punishment?

Mr. DAVIS. And there is no appeal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is suggested that this bill contemplates no appeal. It is not a military court, because among military men the highest honor is observed; no sides are taken, but they stand upon the highest pledge of honor to do justice as between one military man and another. But here is a court, not military in its character, not examining into a military offense at all, but examining into a civil offense—the refusal to recognize a civil right; and that trial is had before this irresponsible officer, and no appeal is allowed. None of the proceedings are defined. What evidence shall be required to convict, what means of procuring witnesses, and how the sentence is to be executed—these are all left to the discretion of the Department. I ask Senators if they are willing to enact such a section into the criminal code of the country.

My judgment is that under the second section of the constitutional amendment we may pass such a law as will secure the freedom declared in the first section, but that we cannot go beyond that limitation. If a man has been, by this provision of the Constitution, made free from his master, and that master undertakes to make him a slave again, we may pass such laws as are sufficient in our judgment to prevent that act; but if the Legislature of the State denies to the citizen as he is now called, the freedman, equal privileges with the white man, I want to know if that Legislature, and each member of that Legislature, is responsible to the penalties prescribed in this bill? It is not an act of the old master; it is an act of the State government, which defines and regulates the civil rights of the people.

But, sir, I have occupied more time than I intended. My purpose this morning was simply to call the attention of the Senate to the remarkable provisions of this bill, and then if it is the pleasure of the Senate to enact it into a law, of course I shall submit. I regard it as very dangerous legislation. It proposes to establish a government within a government—not a republic within a republic, but a cruel despotism within a republic. In times of peace, in communities that are quiet and orderly and obedient to law, it is proposed to establish a government not responsible to the people, the officers of which are not selected by the people, the officers of which need not be of the people governed—a government more cruel, more despotic, more dangerous to the liberties of the people than that against which our forefathers fought in the Revolution. There is nothing that these men may not do, under this bill, to oppress the people.

Sir, if we establish courts in the southern States we ought to establish courts that will be on both sides or on neither side; but the doctrine now is that if a man is appointed, either to an executive or a judicial office, in any locality where there are colored people, he must be on the side of the negro. I have not heard since Congress met that any colored man has done a wrong in this country for very many years; and I have scarcely heard that any white man coming in contact with colored people has done right for a number of years. Everybody is expected to take sides for the colored man against the white man. If I have to take sides, it will be with the men of my own color and my own race; but I do not wish to do that. Toward these people I hope that the legislation of Congress, within the constitutional powers of Congress, will be just and fair—just to them and just to the white people among whom they live; that it will promote harmony among the people, and not discord; that it will restore labor to its channels, and bring about again in those States a condition of prosperity and happiness. Do we not all desire that? If we do, is it well for us to inflame our own passions and the passions of the people of the North so that their judgments shall not be equal upon the questions between these races? It is all very well for us to have sympathy for the poor and the unfortunate, but both sides call for our sympathy in the South. The master, who, by his wickedness and folly, has involved himself in the troubles that now beset him, has returned, abandoning his rebellion, and has bent down upon his humbled knees and asked the forgiveness of the Government, and to be restored again as a citizen. Can a man go further than that? He has been in many cases pardoned by the Executive. He stands again as a citizen of the country.

What relation do we desire that the people of the North shall sustain toward these people of the South? One of harmony and accord, or of strife and ill will? Do we want to restore commerce and trade with them, that we shall prosper thereby as well as they, or do we wish permanent strife and division? I want this to be a Union in form, under the Constitution of the United States, and in fact, by the harmony of the people of the North and of the South. I believe, as General Grant says, that this bureau, especially with the enlarged powers that we propose to confer upon it, will not be an instrument of concord and harmony, but will be one of discord and strife in that section of the country. It cannot do good, but, in my judgment, will do much harm.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I feel it incumbent on me to reply to some of the arguments presented by the Senator from Indiana against this bill. Many of the positions he has assumed will be found, upon examination, to have no foundation in fact. He has argued against provisions not contained in the bill, and he has argued also as if he were entirely forgetful of the condition of the country and of the great war through which we have passed.

Now, sir, what was the object of the Freedmen's Bureau, and why was it established? It was established to look after a large class of people who, as the results of the war, had been thrown upon the hands of the Government, and must have perished but for its fostering care and protection. Does the Senator mean to deny the power of this Government to protect people under such circumstances? The Senator must often have voted for appropriations to protect other classes of people under like circumstances. Whenever, in the history of the Government, there has been thrown upon it a helpless population which must starve and die but for its care, the Government has never failed to provide for them. At this very session, within the last thirty days, both Houses of Congress have voted half a million dollars to feed and clothe the people during the present winter. Who were they? Many of them were Indians who had joined the rebellion and had slain loyal people of the country. Yes, sir, we appropriated money to feed Indians who had been fighting against us. We did not hear the Senator's voice in opposition to that appropriation. What were the facts? It was stated by our Indian agents that the Indian tribes west of Arkansas, a part of whom had joined the rebel armies and some the Union armies, had been driven from their country; that their property had been destroyed; and now, the conflict of arms having ceased, they had nothing to live upon during the winter; that they would encroach upon the white settlements; that unless provision was made for them they would rob, plunder, and murder the inhabitants nearest them; and Congress was called upon to appropriate money to buy them food and clothing, and we did it. We did it for rebels and traitors. Were we not bound to do it?

Now, sir, we have thrown upon us four million people who have toiled all their lives for others; who, unlike the Indians, had no property at the beginning of the rebellion; who were never permitted to own anything, never permitted to eat the bread their own hands had earned; many of whom are without any means of support, in the midst of a prejudiced and hostile population who have been struggling to overthrow the Government. These four million people, made free by the acts of war and the constitutional amendment, have been, wherever they could, loyal and true to the Union; and the Senator seriously asks, what authority have we to appropriate money to take care of them? What would he do with them? Would he allow them to starve and die? Would he turn them over to the mercy of the men who, through their whole lives, have had their earnings, to be enslaved again? It is not the first time that money has been appropriated to take care of the destitute and suffering African. For years it has been the law that whenever persons of African descent were brought to our shores with the intention of reducing them to slavery, the Government should, if possible, rescue and restore them to their native land; and we have appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars for this object. Can anybody deny the right to do it? Sir, humanity as well as the constitutional obligation to suppress the slave trade required it. So now the people relieved by our act from the control of masters who supplied their wants that they might have their services, have a right to rely upon us for assistance till they can have time to provide for themselves.

This Freedmen's Bureau is not intended as a permanent institution. It is only designed to aid these helpless, ignorant, and unprotected people until they can provide for and take care of themselves. The authority to do this, so far as legislative sanction can give it, is to be found in the action of a previous Congress which established the bureau; but if it were a new question, the authority for establishing such a bureau, in my judgment, is given by the Constitution itself; and as the Senator's whole argument goes upon the idea of peace, and that all the consequences of the war have ceased, I shall be pardoned, I trust, if I refer to those provisions of the Constitution which, in my judgment, authorize the exercise of this military jurisdiction—for this bureau is a part of the military establishment not simply during the conflict of arms, but until peace shall be firmly established and the civil tribunals of the country shall be restored with an assurance that they may peacefully enforce the laws without opposition.

The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall have authority "to declare war and make rules concerning captures on land and water," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion," and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." It also declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," and that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government." Under the exercise of these powers the Government has gone through a four years' conflict. It has succeeded in putting down armed resistance to its authority. But did the military power which was exercised to put down this armed resistance cease the moment the rebel armies were dispersed? Has the Government no authority to bring to punishment the authors of this rebellion after the conflict of arms has ceased; no authority to hold as prisoners, if necessary, all who have been captured with arms in their hands? Can it be that the moment the rebel armies are dispersed the military authority ceases, and they are to be turned loose to arm and organize again for another conflict against the Union? Why, sir, it would not be more preposterous on the part of the traveler, after having, at the peril of his life, succeeded in disarming a highwayman by whom he was assailed, to immediately turn round and restore to the robber his weapons with which to make a new assault.

And yet this is what some gentlemen would have this nation do with the worse than robbers who have assailed its life. They propose, the rebel armies being overcome, that the rebels themselves shall be instantly clothed with all the authority they possessed before the conflict, and that the inhabitants of States who for more than four years have carried on an organized war against the Government shall at once be invested with all the powers they had at its commencement, to organize and begin it anew. Nay, more, they insist that without any action of the Government it is the right of the inhabitants of the rebellious States on laying down their arms to resume their former positions in the Union with all the rights they possessed when they began the war. If such are the consequences of this struggle, it is the first conflict in the history of the world, between either individuals or nations, from which such results have followed. What man, after being despoiled of much of his substance, his children slain, his own life periled, and his body bleeding from many wounds, ever restored the authors of such calamities, when within his power, to the rights they possessed before the conflict without taking some security for the future?

Sir, the war powers of the Government do not cease with the dispersion of the rebel armies. They are to be continued and exercised until the civil authority of the Government can be established firmly and upon a sure foundation not again to be disturbed or interfered with. And such, sir, is the understanding of the Government. None of the departments of the Government understand that its military authority has ceased to operate over the rebellious States. It is but a short time since the President of the United States issued a proclamation restoring the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in the loyal States, but did he restore it in the rebellious States? Certainly not. What authority has he to suspend the privilege of that writ anywhere except in pursuance of the constitutional provision allowing the writ to be suspended "when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it?" Then the President understands that the public safety in the insurrectionary States still requires its suspension.

The Attorney General, when asked a few days ago why Jefferson Davis was not put upon trial, told you that, "though active hostilities have ceased, a state of war still exists over the territory in rebellion," so that it could not be properly done. General Grant, in an order issued within a few days—which I commend to the especial consideration of the Senator from Indiana, for it contains many of the provisions of the bill under consideration; an order issued with the approbation of the Executive, for such an order I apprehend could not have been issued without his approbation—declares:

[General Orders, No. 3.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1866.

To protect persons against improper civil suits and penalties in late rebellious States.

Military division and department commanders, whose commands embrace or are composed of any of the late rebellious States, and who have not already done so, will at once issue and enforce orders protecting from prosecution or suit in the State, or municipal courts of such State, all officers and soldiers of the armies of the United States, and all persons thereto attached, or in anywise thereto belonging, subject to military authority, charged with offenses for acts done in their military capacity, or pursuant to orders from proper military authority; and to protect from suit or prosecution all loyal citizens, or persons, charged with offenses done against the rebel forces, directly or indirectly, during the existence of the rebellion; and all persons, their agents and employes, charged with the occupancy of abandoned lands or plantations, or the possession or custody of any kind of property whatever, who occupied, used, possessed, or controlled the same, pursuant to the order of the President, or any of the civil or military departments of the Government, and to protect them from any penalties or damages that may have been or may be pronounced or adjudged in said courts in any of such cases; and also protecting colored persons from prosecutions in any of said States charged with offenses for which white persons are not prosecuted or punished in the same manner and degree.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I propose to make some remarks in reply to the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I wish to ask him one question, and it is this: whether he believes that General Grant, or the President of the United States, had any constitutional authority to make such an order as that? I should like to have an answer to this question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very glad the Senator from Delaware has asked the question. I answer, he had most ample and complete authority. I indorse the order and every word of it. It would be monstrous if the officers and soldiers of the Army and loyal citizens were to be subjected to suits and prosecutions for acts done in saving the Republic, and that, too, at the hands of the very men who sought its destruction. Why, had not the Lieutenant General authority to issue the order? Have not the civil tribunals in all the region of country to which the order applies been expelled by armed rebels and traitors? Has not the power of the Government been overthrown there? Is it yet reestablished? Some steps have been taken toward reestablishing it under the authority of the military, and in no other way. If any of the State governments recently set up in the rebellious States were to undertake to embarrass military operations, I have no doubt they would at once be set aside by order of the Lieutenant General, in pursuance of directions from the Executive. These governments which have been set up act by permission of the military. They are made use of to some extent to preserve peace and order and enforce civil rights between parties; and so far as they act in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the orders of the military commanders, they are permitted to exercise authority; but until those States shall be restored in all their constitutional relations to the Union they ought not to be permitted to exercise authority in any other way.

I desire the Senator from Indiana to understand that it is under this war power that the authority of the Freedmen's Bureau is to be exercised. I do not claim that its officers can try persons for offenses without juries in States where the civil tribunals have not been interrupted by the rebellion. The Senator from Indiana argues against this bill as if it was applicable to that State. Some of its provisions are, but most of them are not, unless the State of Indiana has been in rebellion against the Government; and I know too many of the brave men who have gone from that State to maintain the integrity of the Union and put down the rebellion to cast any such imputation upon her. She is a loyal and a patriotic State; her civil government has never been usurped or overthrown by traitors; and the provisions of the seventh and eighth sections of the bill to which the Senator alludes cannot, by their very terms, have any application to the State of Indiana. Let me read the concluding sentence of the eighth section:

The jurisdiction conferred by this section on the officers and agents of this bureau to cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

Will the Senator from Indiana admit for a moment that the courts in his State are now disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice? If they were ever so disturbed, they are not now. Will the Senator admit that the State of Indiana does not have and exercise all its constitutional rights as one of the States of this Union? The judicial authority conferred by this bill applies to no State, not even to South Carolina, after it shall have been restored in all its constitutional rights.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator whether the language which he is now citing from the eighth section is found in the seventh section of the bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not. The argument which the Senator is now answering is an argument which was made to the seventh section of the bill, and the only limitation upon the operation of the seventh section in any State is that it shall have been a State in which the courts were interrupted by the rebellion; and I stated that whether the courts of Indiana had been at any time interrupted would be a question that might, perhaps, be decided differently by different persons; that there had been an invasion of the State known as the John Morgan raid; whether that amounted to an interruption of the courts I could not tell. Now, if the Senator will answer my argument, as applicable to the seventh section, he will do justice to myself and to the subject. I did not say that the eighth section applied to Indiana.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall be very happy to answer it, and the Senator from Indiana will see how plain a statement shall answer it all. The seventh section does not provide for a court at all; the only provision in the bill providing for a freedman's court is in the eighth section, and the eighth section says that court shall have no jurisdiction in any State that maintains its constitutional relations to the Government. Now, if the Senator from Indiana, out of this, can make it out that a Freedmen's Bureau court is to have jurisdiction in Indiana under the seventh section, he will do what I cannot understand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator will allow me to say that I will make out just what I made out in the first place. The seventh section provides that in any State where the proceedings of the courts have been interrupted, and any of the rights which are enjoyed by white people are denied to colored people, the protection of the military power shall be extended over the persons thus deprived of their civil rights. That is what I said would occur in the State of Indiana if the officers of the bureau should hold that the courts in that State had ever been interrupted; and the limitation in the eighth section, that as soon as the courts again are in full operation the section shall cease to operate in that State, is not applicable to the seventh section, but the seventh section continues in force as long as the State denies the civil rights and extends military protection. I asked the Senator to say just what that was when I was up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before I get through I shall endeavor to state to the Senator from Indiana what I understand by "military protection," which seems to have disturbed him; but at the present time I was undertaking to show that there was no provision in the bill for the exercise of judicial authority except in the eighth section. Rights are declared in the seventh, but the mode of protecting them is provided in the eighth section, and the eighth section then declares explicitly that the jurisdiction that is conferred shall be exercised only in States which do not possess full constitutional rights as parts of the Union. Indiana has at all times had all the constitutional rights pertaining to any State, has them now, and therefore the officers and agents of this bureau can take no jurisdiction of any case in the State of Indiana. It will be another question, which I will answer, and may as well answer now, perhaps, as to what is meant by "military protection."

The second section declares that "the President of the United States, through the War Department, and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau." He wants to know the effect of that in Indiana. This bureau is a part of the military establishment. The effect of that in Indiana is precisely the same as in every other State, and under it the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau will occupy the same position as do the officers and soldiers of the United States Army. What is that? While they are subject to the Rules and Articles of War, if they chance to be in Indiana and violate her laws they are held amenable the same as any other person. The officer or soldier in the State of Indiana who commits a murder or other offense upon a citizen of Indiana is liable to be indicted, tried, and punished, just as if he were a civilian. When the sheriff goes with the process to arrest the soldier or officer who has committed the offense, the military authorities surrender him up to be tried and punished according to the laws of the State. It has always been done, unless in time of war when the courts were interrupted. The jurisdiction and "protection" that is extended over these officers and agents is for the purpose of making them subject to the Rules and Articles of War. It is necessary for this reason: in the rebellious States civil authority is not yet fully restored. There would be no other way of punishing them, of holding them to accountability, of governing and controlling them, in many portions of the country; and it is because of the condition of the rebellious States, and their still being under military authority, that it is necessary to put these officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau under the control of the military power.

The Senator says the original law only embraced within its provisions the refugees in the rebellious States; and now this bill is extended to all of the States, and he wants to know the reason. I will tell him. When the original bill was passed, slavery existed in Tennessee, Kentucky, Delaware, and in various other States. Since that time, by the constitutional amendment, it has been everywhere abolished.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my friend allow me to say one word?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say, as one of the representatives of Delaware on this floor, that she had the proud and noble character of being the first to enter the Federal Union under a Constitution formed by equals. She has been the very last to obey a mandate, legislative or executive, for abolishing slavery. She has been the last slaveholding State, thank God, in America, and I am one of the last slaveholders in America.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, Mr. President, I do not see particularly what the declaration of the Senator from Delaware has to do with the question I am discussing. His State may have been the last to become free, but I presume that the State of Delaware, old as she is, being the first to adopt the Constitution, and noble as she is, will submit to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that there shall be no slavery within its jurisdiction. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order! Order!

Mr. SAULSBURY. She will.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is necessary, Mr. President, to extend the Freedmen's Bureau beyond the rebel States in order to take in the State of Delaware, [laughter.] the loyal State of Delaware, I am happy to say, which did not engage in this wicked rebellion; and it is necessary to protect the freedmen in that State as well as elsewhere; and that is the reason for extending the Freedmen's Bureau beyond the limits of the rebellious States.

Now, the Senator from Indiana says it extends all over the United States. Well, by its terms it does, though practically it can have little if any operation outside of the late slaveholding States. If freedmen should congregate in large numbers at Cairo, Illinois, or at Evansville, Indiana, and become a charge upon the people of those States, the Freedmen's Bureau would have a right to extend its jurisdiction over them, provide for their wants, secure for them employment, and place them in situations where they could provide for themselves; and would the State of Illinois or the State of Indiana object to that? The provisions of the bill which would interfere with the laws of Indiana can have no operation there.

Again, the Senator objects very much to the expense of this bureau. Why, sir, as I have once or twice before said, it is a part of the military establishment. I believe nearly all its officers at the present time are military officers, and by the provisions of the pending bill they are to receive no additional compensation when performing duties in the Freedmen's Bureau. The bill declares that the "bureau may, in the discretion of the President, be placed under a Commissioner and assistant commissioners, to be detailed from the Army, in which event each officer so assigned to duty shall serve without increase of pay or allowances."

The head of this bureau, General Howard, is an officer of the Army. He receives no additional pay or allowances in consequence of performing the duties of Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. I see by a report which I have here that the assistant commissioners also are all, or nearly all of them, officers of the Army. The assistant commissioner for South Carolina is Brevet Major General Rufus Saxton, an officer in the regular Army; for Alabama, Brevet Major General Wager Swayne; for Louisiana, Brevet Major General A. Baird; for Georgia, Brigadier General Davis Tillson; for Kentucky and Tennessee, Brigadier General C. B. Fiske; for Missouri and Arkansas, Brigadier General J. W. Sprague; for Texas, Brigadier General E. M. Gregory; for Virginia, Colonel Orlando Brown; for North Carolina, Colonel E. Whittlesey; for Mississippi, Colonel Samuel Thomas; for Florida, Colonel T. W. Osborne, and for the District of Columbia, Brevet Brigadier General John Eaton, jr.; so that this item of expense, which so alarms the Senator from Indiana, it will be seen, has very little in it. It was the opinion of General Grant that it would, perhaps, be better to detail officers from the Army entirely. I think he rather intimates that opinion in his report; but, upon consultation, it was thought better to leave the discretion to employ civilians in some instances. It was stated that, in some of the southern States, there was manifested a disposition on the part of the people themselves to take care of and provide for the colored people. It was represented that the civil officers in some of the late slaveholding States had been associated with the officers of the bureau, and had aided materially in carrying out the provisions of the law; and it was thought better, therefore, to retain this provision allowing the President of the United States, in his discretion, to appoint civilians if he thought proper. It is a discretion that has been very sparingly exercised heretofore, and never will be exercised, I undertake to say, whenever proper officers of the Army can be found for the performance of the duties.

I shall necessarily, Mr. President, in following the Senator from Indiana, speak somewhat in a desultory manner; but I prefer to do so because I would rather meet the objections made directly then by any general speech. I will therefore take up his next objection, which is to the fifth section of the bill. That section proposes to confirm for three years the possessory titles granted by General Sherman. The Senator from Indiana admits that General Sherman had authority when at the head of the army at Savannah, and these people were flocking around him and dependent upon him for support, to put them upon the abandoned lands; but he says that authority to put them there and maintain them there ceased with peace. Well, sir, a sufficient answer to that would be that peace has not yet come; the effects of war are not yet ended; the people of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, where these lands are situated, are yet subject to military control. But I deny that if peace had come the authority of the Government to protect these people in their possessions would cease the moment it was declared. What are the facts? The owners of these plantations had abandoned them and entered the rebel army. They were contending against the army which General Sherman then commanded. Numerous colored people had flocked around General Sherman's army. It was necessary that he should supply them to save them from starvation. His commissariat was short. Here was this abandoned country owned by men arrayed in arms against the Government. He, it is admitted, had authority to put these followers of his army upon these lands and authorize them to go to work and gain a subsistence if they could. They went on the lands to the number of forty or fifty thousand, commenced work; have made improvements; and now, will the Senator from Indiana tell me that upon any principle of justice, humanity, or law, if peace had come when these laborers had a crop half gathered, the Government of the United States, having rightfully placed them in possession, and pledged its faith to protect them there for an uncertain period, could immediately have turned them off and put in possession those traitor owners who had abandoned their homes to fight against the Government?

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the permission of the Senator, I will answer the question that is propounded by him. It is, whether as an act of justice, if your army was withdrawn and the possessory right ceased in the midst of a growing crop, they could be immediately turned off. I presume the Senator will agree with me that the common-law principle applicable to such a case would apply to that particular case, and that is, that where an estate is uncertain in its duration, and it ceases to exist while a crop is growing, it shall continue until that crop is gathered. For instance, a life estate is uncertain in its duration; a crop is growing, and because of the death of the party upon whose life the estate is dependent the estate ceases; yet it shall continue until the growing crop is gathered. I presume that principle of law would apply to an uncertain possessory right, such as General Sherman undertook to confer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume so, too; the Senator from Indiana and myself agree precisely, and he has admitted now all I desire him to admit. Then the Government having placed these people rightfully upon these lands, and they having expended their labor upon them, they had a right to be protected in their possessions for some length of time after peace on the principle of equity. That is all we propose to do by this bill. The committee thought it would not be more than a reasonable protection to allow them to remain for three years, they having been put upon these lands destitute, without any implements of husbandry, without cattle, horses, or anything else with which to cultivate the land, and having up to the present time been able to raise very little at the expense of great labor. Perhaps the Senator thinks they ought not to remain so long. I will not dispute whether they shall go off at the end of one year or two years. The committee propose two years more. The order was dated in January, 1865, and we propose three years from that time, which will expire in January, 1868, or about two years from this time.

On account of that provision of the bill the Senator asks me the question whether the Government of the United States has the right in a time of peace to take property from one man and give it to another. I say no. Of course the Government of the United States has no authority in a time of peace, by a legislative act, to say that the farm of the Senator from Indiana shall be given to the Senator from Ohio; I contend for no such principle. But following that up, the Senator wants to know by what authority you buy land or provide school-houses for these refugees. Have we not been providing school-houses for years? Is there a session of Congress when acts are not passed giving away public lands for the benefit of schools? But that does not come out of the Treasury, the Senator from Indiana will probably answer. But how did you get the land to give away? Did you not buy it of the Indians? Are you not appropriating every session of Congress money by the million to extinguish the Indian title, money collected off his constituents and mine by taxation? We buy the land and then we give the land away for schools. Will the Senator tell me how that differs from giving the money? Does it make any difference whether we buy the land from the Indians and give it for the benefit of schools, or whether we buy it from some rebel and give—no, sir, use—it for the benefit of schools, with a view ultimately of selling it for at least its cost? I believe I would rather buy from the Indian; but still if the traitor is to be permitted to have a title, we will buy it from him if we can purchase cheaper.

Sir, it is a matter of economy to do this. The cheapest way by which you can save this race from starvation and destruction is to educate them. They will then soon become self-sustaining. The report of the Freedmen's Bureau shows that to-day more than seventy thousand black children are being taught in the schools which have been established in the South. We shall not long have to support any of these blacks out of the public Treasury if we educate and furnish them land upon which they can make a living for themselves. This is a very different thing from taking the land of A and giving it to B by an act of Congress.

But the Senator is most alarmed at those sections of this bill which confer judicial authority upon the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. He says if this authority can be exercised there is an end to all the reserved rights of the States, and this Government may do anything. Not at all, sir. The authority, as I have already shown, to be exercised under the seventh and eighth sections is a military authority, to be exerted only in regions of country where the civil tribunals are overthrown, and not there after they are restored. It is the same authority that we have been exercising all the time in the rebellious States; it is the same authority by virtue of which General Grant issued the order which I have just read. Here is a perfect and complete answer to the objection that is made to the seventh and eighth sections.

But the Senator says that these sections, he supposes, derive their authority, in my opinion, from the amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I think that amendment does confer authority to enact these provisions into law and execute them, not through the military tribunals, but through the judicial tribunals in any State of the Union. What was the object of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery? It was not, as the Senator says, simply to take away the power of the master over the slave. Did we not mean something more than that? Did we not mean that hereafter slavery should not exist, no matter whether the servitude was claimed as due to an individual or the State? The constitutional amendment abolishes just as absolutely all provisions of State or local law which make a man a slave as it takes away the power of his former master to control him.

If the construction put by the Senator from Indiana upon the amendment be the true one, and we have merely taken from the master the power to control the slave and left him at the mercy of the State to be deprived of his civil rights, the trumpet of freedom that we have been blowing throughout the land has given an "uncertain sound," and the promised freedom is a delusion. Such was not the intention of Congress, which proposed the constitutional amendment, nor is such the fair meaning of the amendment itself. With the destruction of slavery necessarily follows the destruction of the incidents to slavery. When slavery was abolished, slave codes in its support were abolished also.

Those laws that prevented the colored man going from home, that did not allow him to buy or to sell, or to make contracts; that did not allow him to own property; that did not allow him to enforce rights; that did not allow him to be educated, were all badges of servitude made in the interest of slavery and as a part of slavery. They never would have been thought of or enacted anywhere but for slavery, and when slavery falls they fall also. The policy of the States where slavery has existed has been to legislate in its interest; and out of deference to slavery, which was tolerated by the Constitution of the United States, even some of the non-slaveholding States passed laws abridging the rights of the colored man which were restraints upon liberty. When slavery goes, all this system of legislation, devised in the interest of slavery and for the purpose of degrading the colored race, of keeping the negro in ignorance, of blotting out from his very soul the light of reason, if that were possible, that he might not think, but know only, like the ox, to labor, goes with it.

Now, when slavery no longer exists, the policy of the Government is to legislate in the interest of freedom. Now, our laws are to be enacted with a view to educate, improve, enlighten, and Christianize the negro; to make him an independent man; to teach him to think and to reason; to improve that principle which the great Author of all has implanted in every human breast, which is susceptible of the highest cultivation, and destined to go on enlarging and expanding through the endless ages of eternity.

I have no doubt that under this provision of the Constitution we may destroy all these discriminations in civil rights against the black man; and if we cannot, our constitutional amendment amounts to nothing. It was for that purpose that the second clause of that amendment was adopted, which says that Congress shall have authority, by appropriate legislation, to carry into effect the article prohibiting slavery. Who is to decide what that appropriate legislation is to be? The Congress of the United States; and it is for Congress to adopt such appropriate legislation as it may think proper, so that it be a means to accomplish the end. If we believe a Freedmen's Bureau necessary, if we believe an act punishing any man who deprives a colored person of any civil rights on account of his color necessary—if that is one means to secure his freedom, we have the constitutional right to adopt it. If in order to prevent slavery Congress deem it necessary to declare null and void all laws which will not permit the colored man to contract, which will not permit him to testify, which will not permit him to buy and sell, and to go where he pleases, it has the power to do so, and not only the power, but it becomes its duty to do so. That is what is provided to be done by this bill. Its provisions are temporary; but there is another bill on your table, somewhat akin to this, which is intended to be permanent, to extend to all parts of the country, and to protect persons of all races in equal civil rights.

But, says the Senator from Indiana, we have laws in Indiana prohibiting black people from marrying whites, and are you going to disregard these laws? Are our laws enacted for the purpose of preventing amalgamation to be disregarded, and is a man to be punished because he undertakes to enforce them? I beg the Senator from Indiana to read the bill. One of its objects is to secure the same civil rights and subject to the same punishments persons of all races and colors. How does this interfere with the law of Indiana preventing marriages between whites and blacks? Are not both races treated alike by the law of Indiana? Does not the law make it just as much a crime for a white man to marry a black woman as for a black woman to marry a white man, and vice versa? I presume there is no discrimination in this respect, and therefore your law forbidding marriages between whites and blacks operates alike on both races. This bill does not interfere with it. If the negro is denied the right to marry a white person, the white person is equally denied the right to marry the negro. I see no discrimination against either in this respect that does not apply to both. Make the penalty the same on all classes of people for the same offense, and then no one can complain.

My object in bringing forward these bills was to bring to the attention of Congress something that was practical, something upon which I hoped we all could agree. I have said nothing in these bills which are pending, and which have been recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary—and I speak of both of them because they have both been alluded to in this discussion—about the political rights of the negro. On that subject it is known that there are differences of opinion, but I trust there are no differences of opinion among the friends of the constitutional amendment, among those who are for real freedom to the black man, as to his being entitled to equality in civil rights. If that is not going as far as some gentlemen would desire, I say to them it is a step in the right direction. Let us go that far, and, going that far, we have the cooperation of the executive department, for the President has told us in his annual message:

"Certainly the Government of the United States is a limited Government; and so is every State government, a limited government. With us this idea of limitation spreads through every form of administration, General, State, and municipal, and rests on the great distinguishing principle of the recognition of the rights of man. The ancient republics absorbed the individual in the State, prescribed his religion, and controlled his activity. The American system rests on the assertion of the equal right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to freedom of conscience, to the culture and exercise of all his faculties. As a consequence, the State government is limited, as to the General Government in the interest of union, as to the individual citizen in the interest of freedom."

The President further says:

"Good faith requires the security of the freedmen in their liberty and their property, their right to labor, and their right to claim the just return of their labor. I cannot too strongly urge a dispassionate treatment of this subject, which should be carefully kept aloof from all party strife."

"The public interest will be best promoted, if the several States will provide adequate protection and remedies for the freedmen."

"Monopolies, perpetuities, and class legislation are contrary to the genius of free government, and ought not to be allowed. Here there is no room for favored classes or monopolies; the principle of our Government is that of equal laws and freedom of industry. Wherever monopoly attains a foothold, it is sure to be a source of danger, discord, and trouble. We shall but fulfill our duties as legislators by according 'equal and exact justice to all men,' special privileges to none."

Such, sir, is the language of the President of the United States in his annual message, and who in this Chamber that is in favor of the freedom of the slave is not in favor of giving him equal and exact justice before the law? Sir, we can go along hand in hand together to the consummation of this great object of securing to every human being within the jurisdiction of the Republic equal rights before the law, and I preferred to seek for points of agreement between all the departments of Government, rather than to hunt for points of divergence. I have not said anything in my remarks about reconstruction. I have not attempted to discuss the question whether these States are in the Union or out of the Union, and so much has been said upon that subject that I am almost ready to exclaim, with one of old, "I know not whether they are in the body or out of the body; God knoweth." It is enough for me to know that the State organizations in several States of the Union have been usurped and overthrown, and that up to the present time no State organization has been inaugurated in either of them which the various departments of Government or any department of the Government has recognized as placing the States in full possession of all the constitutional rights pertaining to States in full communion with the Union.

The Executive has not recognized any one, for he still continues to exercise military jurisdiction and to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in all of them. Congress has not recognized any of them, as we all know; and until Congress and the Executive do recognize them, let us make use of the Freedmen's Bureau, already established, to protect the colored race in their rights; and when these States shall be admitted, and the authority of the Freedmen's Bureau as a court shall cease and determine, as it must when civil authority is fully restored, let us provide, then, by other laws for protecting all people in their equal civil rights before the law. If we can pass such measures, they receive executive sanction, and it shall be understood that it is the policy of the Government that the rights of the colored men are to be protected by the States if they will, but by the Federal Government if they will not; that at all hazards and under all circumstances there shall be impartiality among all classes in civil rights throughout the land—if we can do this, much of the apprehension and anxiety now existing in the loyal States will be allayed, and a great obstacle to an early restoration of the insurgent States to their constitutional relations in the Union will be removed.

If the people in the rebellious States can be made to understand that it is the fixed and determined policy of the Government that the colored people shall be protected in their civil rights, they themselves will adopt the necessary measures to protect them; and that will dispense with the Freedmen's Bureau and all other Federal legislation for their protection. The design of these bills is not, as the Senator from Indiana would have us believe, to consolidate all power in the Federal Government, or to interfere with the domestic regulations of any of the States, except so far as to carry out a constitutional provision which is the supreme law of the land. If the States will not do it, then it is incumbent on Congress to do it. But if the States will do it, then the Freedmen's Bureau will be removed, and the authority proposed to be given by the other bill will have no operation.

Sir, I trust there may be no occasion long to exercise the authority conferred by this bill.

I hope that the people of the rebellious States themselves will conform to the existing condition of things. I do not expect them to change all their opinions and prejudices. I do not expect them to rejoice that they have been discomfited. But they acknowledge that the war is over; they agree that they can no longer contend in arms against the Government; they say they are willing to submit to its authority; they say in their State conventions that slavery shall no more exist among them. With the abolition of slavery should go all the badges of servitude which have been enacted for its maintenance and support. Let them all be abolished. Let the people of the rebellious States now be as zealous and as active in the passage of laws and the inauguration of measures to elevate, develop, and improve the negro, as they have hitherto been to enslave and degrade him. Let them do justice and deal fairly with loyal Union men in their midst, and henceforth be themselves loyal, and this Congress will not have adjourned till the States whose inhabitants have been engaged in the rebellion will be restored to their former position in the Union, and we shall all be moving on in harmony together.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The motion can only be received at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that as we have this bill under consideration we had better continue with it.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us adjourn over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit it to the Senate whether we had not better go on and sit tomorrow for the purpose of continuing its consideration.

Mr. CLARK. I object to the consideration of the motion at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot be received. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the amendment be read. The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out the fifth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the possessory titles granted in pursuance of Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed and made valid.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And be it further enacted, That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possessions for the period of three years from the date of said order; and no person shall be disturbed in, or ousted from, said possession during said three years unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask a question of my friend from Illinois in regard to one clause of the bill. I refer to the provision authorizing the purchase of lands for a particular purpose. My difficulty is a constitutional one, and the objection from which it arises struck me with some force when it was stated by the Senator from Indiana. The bill, as I understand it, authorizes the purchase of land for the purpose of leasing it to colored persons as homesteads. I desire to know whence the authority is derived to do that. My friend will allow me to say that it is not like an appropriation of public lands for such a purpose. That comes under a specific clause of the Constitution giving Congress power "to dispose of" the public lands. The power granted by the Constitution is general, broad, and comprehensive, to dispose of the public lands according to the discretion of Congress. It does, in fact, purchase land within a State by treaty. That has been done in the extinguishment of the Indian titles in the States, but it has been done under the treaty power, and the treaties could not be carried out without an appropriation by Congress for that purpose. But outside of that, I am not aware of any purpose for which lands have been purchased by the General Government except to carry out certain necessary objects of Government. For instance, we must collect the customs, and we may purchase lands for the purpose of erecting thereon a custom-house. There is specific authority for that purpose; but whether we can for any other purposes purchase lands, in order to lease them or give them away for particular objects, however good the objects may be, is a question in regard to which I have some difficulty. I am now by no means expressing an opinion; I am only stating a doubt to the honorable Senator in order that he or some other member of the Committee on the Judiciary may relieve my mind upon the subject. There were other points which the Senator has satisfactorily answered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose that as a general proposition the Government of the United States cannot engage in the purchase of lands with a view of farming them out to the citizens of the United States; but the condition in which we are is peculiar; these people are thrown upon the Government for the time being. It is not proposed to purchase these lands and give them away. The Government, I think, is bound to take care of them. It would have been competent for the Government to have made them all prisoners of war. I suppose that as a question of power the Government might have captured and held in prison all the inhabitants of the South, white and black, where our armies went; it might have sent them, if you please, to the city of Washington, and retained them upon a farm rented by the Government for that purpose, and kept and supplied them there for the time being. We are bound to provide for them. We have that right, I think, as growing out of the war power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the Senator's answer is that it is a necessity outside of the Constitution, and under the war power we can do this thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not regard it as outside of the Constitution. It is a necessity arising out of the war power, and the Constitution gives the war power just as much as it gives any other power, in my view. I think it is very much like the case of Africans thrown upon our coast. Suppose—and such cases have occurred—a slave-trader is driven into one of our harbors with a load of several hundred Africans, and they are landed there, the Government provides for them. We have had a law of Congress providing for such cases for a long time. We take charge of and provide for them and we send them back to Africa; but we are not compelled to send them back; I think we might make a different provision for them. This is a function which, as a nation clothed with war powers, we may exercise. It may not be a judicious mode of doing it; the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau thinks it is. He thinks this will involve no expense to the Government; from the experience he has had in the last year he thinks he can obtain lands upon which to place the freedmen, where they will not only sustain themselves but be able to refund what he has to pay for them. During the progress of the war the Government of the United States has been, and at this very time is, paying rent for tracts of land in nearly all of the States for prison purposes, and various other purposes growing out of the war. These people are upon us just as legally and effectually as if we had captured them and were holding them by force of arms in prison at this time. The Senator will observe that it is only in reference to the indigent that this provision is made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will understand me. I do not object to the thing itself if it can be done; and if it cannot be done the argument of expense or cost is no answer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not put it upon that ground. I was undertaking to show merely that we have occupied land in the various States for war purposes in order to enable us to carry on the war. I do not know that we have purchased these lands, but I do not see why we might not have purchased them if that had been thought more advantageous to the Government. I do not see why the Government might not have purchased the property at Camp Douglas, for instance, near the city of Chicago, where some eight or ten thousand prisoners were confined, and for which the Government has paid or will have to pay a large rent. As a question of power, I cannot see why it could not purchase as well as lease the land. So we have power to provide for these people. The Government having that power has, in my judgment, the power to adopt any means which it thinks best adapted to accomplish that end; and if in the opinion of Congress the best means which can be adopted to take care of these people is to buy land and put them on it, I think we may do it, for the obligation to take care of them is a constitutional obligation imposed upon us as a Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To test the sentiment of the Senate on the question whether this shall be a permanent bureau of the Government, I move to strike out of the first section the words "shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law" in the fifth and sixth lines. This amendment in regard to the duration of the bureau, if adopted, will leave it just as the law of last year left it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have only to say that Congress meets once a year, and can repeal the law at any time. The bureau will expire at the end of a year as the law now stands, and the committee thought it better to leave it in force until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator when that year will end. Does he understand that the year has commenced to run yet or not? I should like to hear from him whether the year has commenced to run.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, if my friend from Illinois makes no objection, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 19, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MERCANTILE MARINE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to decrease of our mercantile marine, and suggesting such remedial legislation as he may deem expedient, in response to a resolution of the House of February 23, 1865.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the report be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. When the vote was taken yesterday on the passage of the bill giving colored people in this District the right to vote I was confined to my room by indisposition. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to record my vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the rule adopted at the last Congress provides that "when any member shall ask leave to vote, the Speaker shall propound to him the question, 'Were you within the bar before the last name on the roll was called?' and if he shall answer in the negative, the Speaker shall not further entertain the request of such member to vote." Under that rule the Chair decides that he cannot ask unanimous consent.

Mr. ROGERS. Cannot the rules be suspended?

The SPEAKER. Only on Monday.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. I have only to say that I would have recorded my vote in favor of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The rule was adopted at the last Congress, under debate, to prevent votes being recorded except when the members were in their seats when the roll was called by the Clerk.

MARY KIRBY SMITH.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of Mary Kirby Smith, and that leave be granted for the withdrawal of the papers from the files of the House, provided copies be left.

The motion was agreed to.

CURRENCY REPORT.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of Congress five thousand copies of so much of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency as is comprised in the first thirteen pages of said report.

The SPEAKER stated that the resolution, under the rules, would be referred to the Committee on Printing.

It was referred accordingly.

COMPENSATION OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the postal laws regulating the compensation of postmasters; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TAX UPON FLATBOATS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of July 14, 1862, as to exempt from enrollment and payment of tonnage tax all flatboats and barges used on the western waters in carrying the products of their owners to market, and not used for hire or as common carriers.

MIAMI INDIANS.

Mr. STILLWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the United States entered into a treaty with the Miami Indians on the 4th day of August, 1854; and whereas it was agreed in said treaty that no persons other than those embraced in the corrected list agreed upon by the Miami of Indiana, in the presence of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, shall be the recipients of payments or annuities unless other persons shall be added to said list by the consent of the Miami Indians of Indiana, obtained in council, according to the custom of the Miami tribe of Indians; and whereas it is deemed by said tribe of Miami Indians of Indiana that there are persons added to said list who are not entitled to any payment or annuities: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to examine, and report by bill or otherwise, who constitute the tribe of Miami Indians of Indiana.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MARY DUNN.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Mary Dunn, widow of Richard Fletcher Dunn; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House what apportionment of the circulating notes authorized by the national currency act has been made to banking associations in the different States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, as required by the amendment to the national currency act, approved March 3, 1865.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order was the call of committees for reports on private cases.

D. C. HAYNES.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the memorial of D. C. Haynes; which was laid on the table.

B. E. BURNS.

Mr. NIBLACK, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the memorial of B. E. Burns, of Missouri; which was laid on the table.

SARAH E. GROWER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Mrs. Sarah E. Grower; which was laid on the table.

DAVID G. BATES.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of David G. Bates; which was laid on the table.

JAMES M'AVOY.

Mr. BARKER, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition for the relief of James McAvoy; which was laid on the table.

GEORGE CALVERT.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report on the petition of George Calvert; which was laid on the table.

DAMAGES IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. McKEE. I would like to make an inquiry in regard to a report submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, taken up for consideration yesterday during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. When the Committee of Claims are called upon for public business again, which will be either to-day, if the morning hour does not expire, or on Tuesday during the morning hour, that will be still business before the House.

VOLUNTEER TROOPS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution No. 44, for the benefit of certain volunteer troops of Missouri, and that the same be referred to the select committee on the war debts of the loyal States.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY JANE CONRAD.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the petition of Mary Jane Conrad; which was laid on the table.

ONE HUNDRED DAYS SOLDIERS.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the resolution to grant pensions to relatives of soldiers who enlisted for one hundred days and died in service; which was laid on the table.

BERKELEY AND JEFFERSON COUNTIES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. On the 12th of January the Judiciary Committee reported back a joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia, with a written report recommending that the resolution be passed. In order that the report might be printed, and give a little further time, the resolution was recom-mitted to the Judiciary Committee. A motion was made to reconsider that vote, and I desire now to take up that motion, so that the matter may be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. When the House is engaged at any time in the consideration of public business that will be in order; but it is not in order when private business is under consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Very well; I will make the motion at some other time.

CHARLES F. ANDERSON.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. The Committee on Public Grounds have directed me to report a bill for the relief of Charles F. Anderson. I wish to state that this bill passed both branches of Congress at the last session, but failed to obtain the signature of the President by some inadvertency. The old gentleman for whom this relief is proposed is waiting here. The bill has passed the Senate twice. It is accompanied by a petition which can be read if necessary. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles F. Anderson, architect, the sum of $7,500 in full for time, labor, and expense in preparing plans and drawings for the Capitol extension.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Unless some gentleman desires the reading of the petition, I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The call of committees for reports of a private nature having been concluded,

The SPEAKER stated that the committees would now be called for reports of a public character.

WAR TROPHIES.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to offer a resolution calling for some information proper to be had before he takes up the Military Academy bill.

Mr. STEVENS. If it applies to that bill I have no objection, and will waive my motion for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, then submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House copies of the correspondence which took place in or about the month of June, 1865, between the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy and the chief of the Engineer corps of the United States Army, in relation to marking with the names of any battles in which they were taken, or otherwise, guns captured during the rebellion, and preserving the same as public trophies at West Point.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill further to secure to American citizens certain privileges under the treaty of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill further to prevent smuggling; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, as reported by the select committee on that subject, be printed for the use of the House in pamphlet form.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

STAMP DUTY ON WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing that portion of the internal revenue law relating to stamp duties upon written instruments, and referred to in schedule B of said law.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope the gentleman will change the word "instructed" to "requested."

Mr. CULLOM. I will do that.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

CENSUS BUREAU.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of consolidating the Census Bureau with the Provost Marshal's Bureau, and that they be permitted to report by bill or otherwise.

PAY OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. I now insist on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair.)

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The CHAIRMAN announced the first business to be the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] to permit this bill to be passed over informally, because it is my desire to offer some amendments to it on behalf of the Board of Visitors at West Point, of which I happen to be chairman. I am not now ready to offer those amendments, as the report is not yet printed. I will, therefore, move to postpone this bill for the present.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman says he is not now prepared with his amendments, I cannot resist his motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. The report is not yet printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope it will be ready so that we may proceed with it on Monday.

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 122, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand, from information just given me, that the Committee on Naval Affairs have some amendments which they desire to propose to this bill, but are not quite ready to submit them now. I do not like to delay the consideration of this bill; but to enable them to submit those amendments I will consent that this bill be laid aside for the present. But I hope that we will be ready on Monday to proceed with the consideration of all these appropriation bills.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not object to that; but I desire it to be understood that it is not done at the request of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; then we may as well go on with the bill now.

The bill was then read at length; after which the Clerk proceeded to read it by clauses for amendments.

At the conclusion of the reading of the paragraph making appropriations for the Bureau of Yards and Docks—

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, said: I believe there has been omitted from the printed bill an appropriation asked for from the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. I would ask the Committee on Appropriations if that committee did not have such an item as that before them. There is an estimate for $800,000 for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, which I understand has been accidentally omitted.

Mr. STEVENS. There was such an item reported in our bill, but it is not in the copy on file. We had intended to introduce the item before the item for the Bureau of Medicine.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It would properly come in before the appropriation for the Bureau of Navigation. I will take this occasion to say, that in this Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting there is an excess of the appropriation for fuel of more than sufficient to cover what is asked for the expenses of the present year. Therefore, if the Committee on Appropriations shall see fit to consent to an amendment to authorize the transfer from the appropriation for fuel to the appropriation for contingent expenses for that bureau, it will not be necessary to make a new appropriation of $800,000 for this purpose. I will offer the following amendment, to come in after the paragraph making appropriation for the Bureau of Yards and Docks:

Provided, That there be transferred from appropriations for fuel to the contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. At the conclusion of the appropriations for the navy-yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to strike out the following paragraph:

For the purchase of Seavey's Island, $100,000: Provided, That a perfect and approved title in fee to the whole island can be obtained and vested in the United States for that sum.

Mr. SPALDING. Before that motion is put, I desire to make a motion to perfect this paragraph. The estimate was $105,000. The committee agreed to the appropriation for that sum, but by some mistake it appears in the bill for $100,000. I move to make the appropriation $105,000, according to the estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make this motion, in the first place, for the purpose of getting some information in regard to the necessity for this appropriation; and in the second place, because it is improper legislation, as I conceive, to be in a general appropriation bill. And I hope I will have the attention of the committee for a few moments, as we are now entering for the first time this session upon the consideration of one of the most important subjects upon which we can be called to act, that is, action upon general appropriation bills. I am certain that our constituents and the country look to us to guard most vigilantly the appropriations which we make in the present state of the national finances, and I was in hopes that this committee, so able as it is, and so well acquainted with the rules of the House, which require that no appropriation should appear in the general appropriation bills but to carry out existing laws, would have regarded what I have always contended was one of the wisest rules of the House, that the Committee on Appropriations should be confined to carry out the provisions of existing laws, and not inaugurate new legislation in an appropriation bill.

Now, sir, here is a provision in this bill which is in defiance of the rules of the House, as to which we cannot now take objection in the committee, because the House has referred this subject to the Committee of the Whole. But I desire to know from the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will be made to understand, why it is that we should be called upon at this time to make this appropriation of $105,000 for the purchase of Seavey's Island. We have gone through a war, one of the most stupendous, as it has been often said, that the world has ever known; we have passed through the war, and there is not now that necessity for these navy-yards and these appropriations which existed heretofore. I cannot believe, if the navy-yard at Kittery, where I believe this island is, was sufficient during the rebellion for all purposes, that it is now necessary, in time of peace and the present state of our finances, to make this further and additional appropriation. I am entirely in the dark as regards the reasons which may be urged, but they must be very strong reasons to induce me to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. HALE. Does not the same objection apply to the appropriation at line one hundred and thirty-eight and that at line one hundred and sixty-five?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir; and I intend to attend to those matters when we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that my friend from Illinois requires some information upon this subject. The committee to whom it was referred sought information, not knowing beforehand whether the appropriation was proper or not. We sent for one of the ablest and most candid chiefs of bureaus connected with this Government, Admiral Smith; and we inquired of him fully and thoroughly in regard to the propriety of this appropriation.

For years past the operations of this navy-yard have been so cramped that the Government has been obliged to rent adjoining property for the purpose of carrying on the business of the yard. Seavey's Island furnishes a waterfront which would render all other purchases or rentals entirely unnecessary. The estimates proposed that we should appropriate $126,000 for officers' quarters, as the officers are now obliged to board in an adjoining town. Upon Seavey's Island there are now a large number of houses, which, Admiral Smith informs us, would, if the island were purchased, be sufficient for officers' quarters, for which the appropriation of $126,000 was asked.

Besides, the purchase of this island would give the Government a large area of ground, always necessary and always increasing in value. The Government now owns one part of the island; but the owners of the remainder of it have, by the authority of the law under which the Government purchased, established through the navy-yard a very troublesome thoroughfare, interfering very much with the convenience of the operations of the Government.

The committee, under all these circumstances, and knowing that, at the last Congress, the Committee on Naval Affairs examined this subject, and I believe recommended this very purchase, thought that, while we could afford to purchase Seavey's Island for the purpose of making complete a very important navy-yard, we could save by the purchase not only the $126,000 estimated for officers' quarters, but also $25,000 which would be necessary for a quay-wall. We thus became convinced that this would be a wise and economical appropriation, securing a property which is from year to year rising in value, and becoming more incumbered with private buildings, so that after a few years it will be beyond the reach of the Government, and the want of this property will so cramp operations there as to make this navy-yard almost useless.

Now, sir, I have no particular interest or feeling in connection with this matter. Admiral

Smith is very decided in his opinion that this property should now be purchased by the Government. He furnishes us with facts and drawings which enforce his position. If that navy-yard is to be kept up it seems to me that it is unwise for us to refuse this appropriation, thereby rendering necessary others still larger, which would give us no such conveniences. It is for the House to determine whether the purchase of this island, embracing seventy or eighty acres, is not expedient. I have stated the judgment of the committee, which seems to be wise.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee have no feeling on this subject. There was for a long time a great diversity of sentiment among the members of the committee in regard to this appropriation for the purchase of Seavey's Island. We elicited all the information on the subject that we could obtain from the proper bureau of the Navy Department, and we finally came to the conclusion that the purchase of this island would be a measure of economy; for I agree with our chairman [Mr. STEVENS] that if this item be struck out, it will be found to be imperatively necessary to insert in this or some other appropriation bill items to a greater amount for this very navy-yard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for one moment?

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask this question: if the Government has been able to get along thus far without making this purchase, why can it not get along for some time further?

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, during the progress of the mighty war which so lately taxed all the energies and resources of the Government, many of us in this House, in common with my friend from Illinois, resisted every appropriation which could by any possibility be dispensed with, for we did not know but that the utmost dollar might be needed to sustain our Army and Navy in the conflict; that was the reason. But happily we are now at peace at home; now is the time to prepare for conflict with other Powers whose enmity and jealousy we must encounter if we live in accordance with what we learn from the history of nations in times of peace—in time of peace prepare for war. European Powers are swelling their navies. Shall we put off our whole armor, and not only that, but put off all the means of making our armor, because we have put down a rebellion at home?

Why, sir, we are continually growing. Our progress has not stopped. As we are increasing in power our resources are increasing; and we must increase with our resources our means of defending them. This is my answer to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let me say a word.

Mr. SPALDING. I say that we have a much larger Navy now than when the war commenced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All I desire is full information on the subject. Will the gentleman furnish us with information in regard to the present naval establishment? How much has the Navy been decreased since last year when the war terminated?

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot give the particulars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. From seven hundred to one hundred.

Mr. SPALDING. Counting the vessels purchased from the mercantile marine our Navy is not one twentieth as large as during the war; but the vessels built by the Navy Department for war purposes are retained, every one of them. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Chairman, I have one word to say in regard to the practice in this House in respect to making appropriations where laws are wanted.

Mr. STEVENS. Allow me to say a single word at this point.

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. The rule provides that, when there are changes of this kind to carry out the recommendation of any Department of the Government, it shall be our duty to report them from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is not such a case as is provided for by the rule.

Mr. SPALDING. The committee became satisfied that by the purchase of Seavey's Island we could dispense with the erection of officers' quarters, for which a large estimate was made for appropriation at our hands, inasmuch as there are fifteen to twenty buildings on that island which will answer the purpose of officers' quarters. And it will supersede the necessity of extending some of the buildings used for naval purposes in the navy-yard, and will thus save that additional expense. If we purchase the whole of this island—if the whole of it can be purchased, which is a matter of uncertainty; if we can obtain a perfect title to it, which is questionable—then this appropriation is not to be expended. If we can obtain a perfect title to the whole island, we can obtain these barracks without further appropriation. It will be a great saving to the nation.

I pledge myself to the gentleman from Illinois to go with him for all measures for saving money where we can save it without doing greater injury to the interests of the country.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio, before he finally resumes his seat, one question, if he will allow me.

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. How much do we save annually on the theory he advances for making this appropriation?

Mr. SPALDING. I refer the gentleman to the chairman of the committee who gave the estimates.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not hear it, and would like to hear it. I would like to know how much we save according to the estimates.

Mr. STEVENS. From fifteen to twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. Annually?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, the impression might remain upon the minds of the House that the committee were unanimous in recommending this appropriation if I were not to add one word to what has been said. Having dissented to the appropriation this year, on the actual condition of the facts connected with the actual condition of that island, I desire to say one word.

It is true that one hundred and twenty thousand and odd dollars were asked in the estimates, were asked by the Department for officers' quarters. I have opposed uniformly, in the committee and in the House, last year and this, appropriations for mere convenience.

The rule by which I have been guided on all subjects is this: that in the present condition of the Treasury of the United States any appropriation which was not necessary or specially economical was not to be made by this House or by Congress, for the simple reason that we must first adjust and protect the indispensable debt of the United States and pay the indispensable expenses of the Government. I have regarded these officers' quarters in every navy-yard which contains partial quarters for some four or five of the principal officers of the yard—I have regarded the appropriations to that extent only as authorized by us. Beyond that I have regarded it as simply a matter of convenience to the officers who might be ordered from time to time to the yard.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman if these officers do not have to go to town to board?

Mr. KASSON. So far as my information extends, I am not aware of a single exception to the fact, that where the officers' quarters—which usually embrace about four buildings—are not sufficient for all the officers, they find quarters elsewhere for their temporary convenience. Now, sir, the expense of locating special quarters involves the erection of private houses for their accommodation. On Seavey's Island there are some nine or ten houses which it is proposed to acquire. It is doing indirectly what some propose to do directly. I suppose the object of my colleague is to save further appropriation by this. I see nothing that is to be saved by the acquisition of the island. I see that it is a convenience in getting that island, which contains about seventy acres of land, but I do not see anything at all beyond the convenience of the navy-yard. It is not that kind of necessity which, in the present condition of the Treasury, should authorize and require us to make an appropriation for it at this time. And without expressing any feeling on the subject, I simply wished to state the rule by which my vote will be guided. I dissent from the views of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MARSTON. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that in the present state of the finances of the country its utmost attention should be given to every item of appropriation, and that not one dollar should be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States that is not absolutely demanded by the wants of the public service. That will be the principle that will guide my conduct in all these appropriations, whether the money is to be expended in New Hampshire or elsewhere. It has been for a long time an object with the Navy Department to acquire Seavey's Island for the convenience and the enlargement of the navy-yard at that station. Now, as a pure matter of economy, if there was no other consideration in it whatever but just the saving of dollars to the United States Government, I solemnly aver that I believe if this island had belonged to the Government at the commencement of the war, we should have saved double what is proposed to be appropriated to the purchase of it, in the labor that has been expended there in moving materials from one part of the island to the other for the purpose of carrying on the business of the yard. So crowded has been every foot of ground upon it that not a ship could be started, nor any new business commenced there, without moving timber and material of all sorts from one part of the island to the other. A vast number of men and teams have been constantly employed in doing that from the commencement of the war to this day. The portion now occupied on the rear is about sixty-five acres; that which it is proposed to acquire will contain from seventy to eighty acres. It is separated from the navy-yard by two hundred feet of water, and is connected by a bridge built by the United States.

Now there is no place in this navy-yard suitable for a hospital, for officers' quarters, or for a magazine. And there is to-day, in the magazine on that little island, I believe, some two hundred tons of gunpowder. There is not a man in the yard that is not afraid of his life from that magazine. And if by accident there should be an explosion in that magazine, not a single ship or building or anything in or about that yard would remain standing.

Now, it is a fact that there is no naval station in this country to which it is so proper for ships coming from southern climes to go and report to the navy-yard on account of health as this. They are sent there uniformly, and when they get there there is no proper hospital, and no place to build one. There is no place for a coal depot on the island on which the navy-yard is built. There is not sufficient room for ships. There is not sufficient room to carry on the work that has been necessary to do there during this war.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] refers to the matter of officers' quarters as a simple convenience. Now, everybody who knows anything about navy-yards knows that it is highly important, not only for the good discipline of the yard, but for the safety of the property there, that the officers should have their quarters in the yard, and not a mile or two off in some town where they cannot be called upon in case of an emergency. Now, sir, on every consideration on which this matter can be looked at, as a matter of convenience to the Navy, as a matter of saving money to the Government and enlarging the facilities of doing business there, this island ought to be purchased.

A few years ago a commission was authorized by Congress and appointed by the President to visit all the navy-yards in the country and report the kind of work done at each, where it was done cheapest, where ships were built best, and everything pertaining to the question of navy-yards, and beyond all question they gave the preference in the building of ships to the Portsmouth navy-yard. Why? In the first place, they are built cheaper there than anywhere else. They found that there was a better class of mechanics employed there than anywhere else, because they were not taken from large cities, but were substantial citizens residing in the surrounding country, and were of that class of men who did more work and did it better than the mechanics in any other navy-yard in the country. They found also that the ships built there lasted longer, partly because they were better built, but more particularly because the timber docked there lasted longer than that docked elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, what would this island of seventy or eighty acres sell for? What is it worth without reference to its occupation for a navy-yard? What is it worth in the market?

Mr. MARSTON. I am unable to answer the gentleman. There are seventy or eighty acres of land on which, I should think, there are twenty-five or thirty houses, mostly owned by the mechanics who work in the yard, but there are some very good houses belonging to gentlemen who reside in Boston or elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIS. Can the gentleman form any approximate estimate? Would it be worth $25,000, or $50,000, or any sum less than $100,000? I think it would be well for us to know its intrinsic value.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state this much, that two years ago Congress made an appropriation of thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars to buy a little corner of the island for the purpose of getting water rights, and they could not purchase it at that sum, it being only two or three acres out of the whole seventy-nine.

Mr. HILL. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New Hampshire with regard to those private dwellings upon the island. I learn from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] as well as from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that there are several private dwellings upon the island the title to which will not, as I understand it, be transferred to the Government by the purchase of the island. I desire to know whether any estimate has been made as to the value or the price at which these private dwellings can be obtained, or whether we shall be called upon to purchase that property.

Mr. KASSON. I answer the gentleman that the estimate for the purchase of the island includes all the buildings and the land. It would be entirely inexpedient to purchase the buildings, with their sites, unless the whole island is obtained. All the committee agree upon that, and all the committee agree that anything less than the $105,000 proposed for the purchase of the island would be useless. If it is expedient to purchase the island, it is undoubtedly expedient to purchase the whole of it, and appropriate this sum for it.

Mr. HILL. Then do I understand that the $105,000 will give us title to the whole island and to the buildings upon it?

Mr. KASSON. It is estimated that there is every probability of our being able to purchase the island, with the buildings, for $105,000. That is the estimate.

I will say, in reply to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that there is a road across the island that has interfered, to some extent, with the purchase of a small part of it that was designed for the use of the hospital. The committee, I believe I may say, are unanimous in the opinion that if an appropriation is to be made for the purchase of any portion of the island, it is expedient to purchase the whole, the difference being only as to the propriety of making the entire purchase at this time.

Mr. MARSTON. I desire to say only a word further in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] in relation to the value of this island and the houses thereon, and what it would probably sell for for other purposes. My belief is that it could not be purchased for anything near $100,000 by outside parties. But the only way of getting on and off that island, except by boat, is by passing through the navy-yard. And the Government would never be able to get the title to this property for $105,000 except upon the idea that if it is not sold to the Government, and the Department should take away the bridge over which all now have to pass to get on the island, the property would not be worth so much to the owners as it now is.

Mr. PIKE. I should not add anything to what the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MARSTON] has so well said upon this point but for one consideration. It becomes a material question now with us, what will we do with the Navy? Shall we establish it upon a permanent footing, and take means to make us in fact what we claim to be, a first-class naval Power; or shall we fall back and resume our old position, the position which we held before the war? The Committee on Appropriations have recommended large increase of appropriations for three or four navy-yards in this country. They recommend an appropriation of something more than $500,000 for the Charlestown navy-yard, $1,500,000 for New York, and nearly $500,000 for Norfolk. That is one way for increasing our capacity for continuing and perpetuating our Navy.

Another proposition which is urged upon this House with considerable force is to establish a new navy-yard—a proposition which was voted upon at the last Congress. I do not say where the navy-yard is to be, but at some proper place, no doubt.

Now, the House is to determine, and it may as well be done upon this appropriation as any other, whether they will increase the capacity of our navy-yards in the first place; and in the next place, how they will do it. The proposed increase is not large, and the objection taken to it by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is not well taken; that is, that we have made a large navy for the purpose of carrying us through the war without the aid of increased navy-yards, and now in time of peace we cannot need any such increase. But he forgets that during the war we levied upon every private ship-yard of the country of capacity enough to build a five-hundred-ton vessel. He forgets that everywhere, from Maine to the Potomac, the private ship-yards, the private foundries, the private machine shops were worked to their utmost capacity. And we have large claims presented to Congress now for additional pay, because men who entered into contracts were unable to fulfill their contracts because the Government had anticipated them, and had taken to itself all the supplies of mechanism and of labor in the country. And in addition to that every navy-yard in the country was largely over-worked.

Any one at all familiar with the subject knows that at Portsmouth, at Charlestown, at Brooklyn, and at Philadelphia the work required of the navy-yards was largely in excess of the capacity of those yards, and the work actually turned out there was turned out at great disadvantage, because of want of room and want of proper facilities at those yards.

Now, sir, my idea is not that we shall attempt to rival the great navy-yards of Europe. There is no need of that. Any one familiar with those yards knows that it would require the expenditure of fifty or a hundred million dollars to bring our navy-yards up to their standard—I mean of the leading maritime Powers. But we should have such moderate increase of our various yards as will enable us to do the proper work pertaining to them, the work necessary to keep in proper condition a hundred naval vessels, and to repair or lay up the vessels not in active service. Having done this, we shall be prepared, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has well said, for that next war, which is of course to be on the ocean.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had no intention of adding a word to the many good reasons that have been given for this appropriation, and yet, as it was my privilege, during the last summer, to visit this navy-yard for the express purpose of seeing the wants of the yard, I ought, perhaps, to say a word in relation to it. I went through the yard in company with the officers in charge of it, and so great was the obstruction there by reason of lumber, ship materials, and stores of various kinds, that we were obliged to wind our way as through the streets of a great city. I was told by the officers in charge there that they were obliged to move the lumber and materials necessary for the repair of vessels three or four times over before they could be used, because they had not sufficient room in the yard. And the amount of expense which the yard was thus put to, for want of room, would in a few years equal the whole amount asked for to purchase Seavey's Island. It is also known that there is a somewhat extended water-front to this navy-yard; but there is but a small space where vessels can approach the wharf for provisions and coal; so that, in supplying vessels with coal, it is sometimes necessary to remove the coal two or three times. If this island were purchased, the Government would have a depot for its coal.

Then, again, the dry-dock at that navy-yard is nearly worn out, and its capacity is not sufficient for the larger class of vessels now in use; so that in a very brief period, in the course of a few years, it would be necessary either to excavate another dock, or to build a bulkhead at the front of the small outlet or stream between Seavey's Island and the present navy-yard. By building this bulkhead, and pumping out the water, the Government would have a dry-dock without the expense of a new excavation. The expense of excavating a dry-dock would probably be greater than the whole amount now proposed to be expended by this appropriation.

Besides, sir, if the yellow fever or any other contagious disease should break out in the navy-yard at Portsmouth, the whole yard would have to be laid under quarantine and all operations stopped there, even though it were in time of war. But if the Government should purchase this island, it could build upon it a hospital to which, if yellow fever or any other contagious disease should break out, those afflicted could be removed, while the operations of the yard could go on as before.

It seems to me, sir, that these reasons are ample and unanswerable in favor of this appropriation. Let me mention another consideration. A few days ago, I visited the Secretary of the Navy, by request of a large number of workmen in that yard, who ask that their pay may be increased. The Secretary told me that if the wages were increased, the amount of work in that yard must be decreased, and that the reason why so much work was thrown into the Portsmouth navy-yard was that the work could be done more cheaply there than in any other yard in the country. This constitutes another reason why this yard should be extended, so that the work of the Navy Department may be done where that work can be done best and most cheaply. And every one who has read the history of the Kearsarge knows that at that yard the work is well done.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Chairman, nothing can be clearer to my mind than the principles by which the committee should be governed upon all questions like this. The most obvious considerations—considerations destined to force themselves most painfully upon everybody who shall live in this country for a few years to come—compel us to vote against any appropriation of money unless it is absolutely indispensable. In order to be indispensable, the appropriation should be necessary to the actual progress of the operations of the Government, or else it should be the only mode of preventing a result certain to lead in the end to a loss greater than the amount of money asked. This principle, it seems to me, is very clear. The difficulty is in its application; and I, for one, regret exceedingly that about a matter apparently so simple as this we cannot have such a statement of facts as will enable every member of the committee to illustrate by his vote the principle which I have announced.

If it be true that this purchase is necessary to carry on the operations of this navy-yard, so be it; there is no answer to it, and no question what we should do. If, on the other hand, it be true, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] believes, that although in a certain sense the operations there might continue without this appropriation, nevertheless the expenses incidental to carrying it on, without the purchase of this island, would shortly lead to the expenditure of a sum greater than the amount asked, so be it; in that case also the principle I have announced would compel us to vote for this appropriation.

But, Mr. Chairman, there seems to be more than a doubt whether either of these propositions is true. At least, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who is a member of the committee, and has had the benefit of its investigation, has failed entirely to be convinced that either of these propositions can truly be affirmed. And for one, I am free to say, and am glad to have an early opportunity to say, that wherever there is a doubt, a fair doubt, about an appropriation, I propose to give the Government the benefit of that doubt. I say that, at this time, at all events, the presumption is against an appropriation, especially an appropriation in a bill of this sort for a purpose not already fixed by law. It comes here with the presumption against it; and before it can have my vote the case must be made so clear that there can be no doubt of its falling within the principle by which I wish to be governed.

Now, as I have remarked, there is a great doubt about the necessity of this appropriation, and therefore I for one am constrained to vote against it. And I shall set my face firmly against every doubtful proposition, believing, as I do, that nothing in the way of responsibility rests upon every member of this House so unmistakably and so gravely as to insist continually upon retrenchment and economy in every branch of the public service.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. PIKE. Did I correctly understand from the gentleman's argument that he is in favor of a decrease of our naval force?

Mr. CONKLING. Really I do not know, Mr. Chairman, how the gentleman understands that from anything I have said.

Mr. PIKE. I was about to ask the gentleman, on that basis, why he allowed an appropriation of $0,386,638 for the pay of the Navy to go unchallenged?

Mr. CONKLING. I have never been good at guessing at conundrums. I did not express any opinion about reducing or augmenting our naval force.

Mr. PIKE. I based my supposition upon what everybody except the gentleman knows, that the policy of maintaining or augmenting our naval force is necessarily intimately connected with maintaining our navy-yards.

Mr. CONKLING. The question here is, whether, for the purpose of carrying on this navy-yard, this appropriation is indispensable, and if it is not indispensable whether it is called for to avoid a greater expense; that is the practical question. And my point is this: the gentleman from Maine and the other members of the committee who espouse this appropriation, fail to show with sufficient clearness to satisfy my mind that it is necessary at all; and therefore I am constrained to vote against it.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that where ever there is any doubt the gentleman will vote against an appropriation. Now, I suppose that there is no appropriation to which some men will not object. Then the gentleman will not vote for any appropriation.

Mr. CONKLING. That is a suggestion of great propriety, and I have to make but a single remark in answer to it. When a committee, and especially a committee so able as the Committee on Appropriations in this House, report a measure, even though not unanimously, it ought to have great weight. When a Department recommends a proposition, it ought to have great weight; and it would be idle for any man to sit here and speculate on the shadow of doubts. And if in the practical discussion here very grave doubts in reality had not in reality been cast upon this, I would not have voted against it. I say, despite the recommendation of the committee, despite the sanction of the Department, this discussion has developed the fact that this question is at least a doubtful one, and I give the benefit of that doubt to the side of economy and retrenchment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to occupy the attention of the committee on this subject, but I am impelled to do so from the direction the discussion has taken.

And, first, I want to say a single word on the question of economy, for I am unwilling to admit there is any gentleman upon this floor who is entitled to take precedence of myself in a desire to reduce the expenses of this Government. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact in the light of this question of economy: that the appropriations asked for by the Navy Department last year, if I remember rightly, amounted to $150,000,000. The estimates made them for the present year only about $123,000,000. The Committee on Appropriations, if I have correctly scanned the bill, have reduced the estimates about $5,000,000. And the very first thing I did myself upon this bill was to offer an amendment by which the Government should save $800,000 more, because I had investigated the matter and found certain sums belonging to unexpended appropriations which might be transferred to other appropriations, saving new appropriations to be raised by taxation this year.

Now, sir, the close of the war has rendered it possible for the Government to retrench and reduce on all hands. Among the first Departments that commenced retrenchment was the Department of the Navy. Within ten days of the fall of Fort Fisher orders were sent from the Navy Department to commence the reduction of the naval force. That was on the 24th of February. On the 20th of May orders were sent to the commanders of squadrons to reduce the naval force by all vessels not profitably and necessarily employed. Again, on the 31st of July, or about the 1st of August, other orders were sent to make the greatest possible retrenchment in the naval force. I say from Fort Fisher up to this hour no member of this House or of this Government has displayed greater anxiety to retrench the expenses of this Government than the Department of the Navy.

Now, sir, it is asked, "Where is the necessity of increasing these yards at the present time?" Gentlemen have said, "You have got along during four years, and why cannot you get along for four years more, or an indefinite period?" Well, sir, if we were a perfectly mature Government, if we were an effete nation, if we were a nation going backward, then we might raise the question why we might not eternally stand still with the facilities we now have for carrying on the Government. But I do not understand this to be any such kind of Government or any such kind of nation. We are increasing rapidly in population; we are rapidly covering over our immense territory; and where ever there is a foot of land occupied, whether it be on the Atlantic or in the great West, in the case of a foreign war which is to be settled on the sea, the welfare, the interest of every man, whether on the coast or in the interior, is alike jeopardized by the inefficiency of our naval force.

Now, sir, at the commencement of this war we had only about sixty vessels. It was necessary for the Department to put into active operation not only all the vessels it could make itself, but to press into the service all the private establishments of the country in manufacturing ships and machinery. But even that was insufficient, and the Department went forth and bought all the vessels they could find in the mercantile marine that were adapted or that could be adapted to naval purposes; and the Navy rose from sixty vessels to nearly seven hundred during the war.

Now, the retrenchment to which I alluded in the commencement of my remarks commenced on these purchased vessels. They have been sold back again into the merchant service for the most part. But still there is a large number remaining which is a permanent increase of the Navy. There have been constructed during the past four years between two and three hundred ships, which are legitimate vessels, to be used by the Government or taken care of, and the idea that our navy-yards, that could accommodate sixty vessels, store them and keep them in repair there for the future wants of the Government when they may again be put into the service, are capable of taking care of between two and three hundred ships is, on the face of it, an absurdity. Our navy-yards have not been enlarged during the period of the war. Our ships are now coming home, and they are to be laid up. They must be properly cared for. There are other vessels on stocks that must be so far finished as to be protected from decay. And I want to say to gentlemen, that it is an absolute necessity that these yards shall be enlarged, or the interest of the naval service must materially suffer, in my opinion, to an extent vastly greater than the outlay that is proposed to be made in this bill to enlarge these yards.

This recommendation comes from the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has been before that committee, which was the proper place for him to go, and has there explained the details of this necessity. And it has come to us under the recommendation of the head of the Navy Department, and I do not find any person connected with the naval service anywhere who has any doubt upon this subject. And, so far as I know, no gentleman who has visited these yards, and has himself made a personal inspection of the degree to which they are crowded and the hazard from fire that exists there, has any doubt whatever about the necessity of either enlarging these yards or providing new ones. And gentlemen on the committee will be capable of judging whether they can better increase at the present yards the facilities for carrying on this work, or whether we shall make somewhere else a vast original outlay.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise, in order to close general debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope not. I think we might as well discuss this matter a little further.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on this bill all debate cease, except the five minutes' debate on amendments.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will make it ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, that in ten minutes after its consideration shall be resumed all general debate on the bill shall close, leaving the five minutes' debate; and that when the pending amendment shall be disposed of, this bill shall be laid aside, and the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, when I moved to strike out this clause, I stated that one of my reasons was for the purpose of obtaining information as to the facts in relation to the case which would justify this appropriation, and I must confess that I have not been satisfied with the information which I have received.

I might say, perhaps, that if anything could satisfy me with regard to the propriety of an appropriation it would be the assent of my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] whom I know so well, and with whom I trained in the last Congress in this matter, and I might say also the information furnished by the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. MARSTON,] yet I am not clear, from all the information I have received, that this appropriation ought to be made.

Now, sir, the grounds which have been set forth here in the committee do not seem to tally very well with the grounds which are alleged by the gentleman who has been so often quoted, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. His communication upon this subject accompanies the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and I call the attention of the committee to what Admiral Smith says in relation to this matter. He does not put it upon the ground of the immense amount which the gentleman from Pennsylvania says will be saved if this appropriation is made. Here is what he says:

"At the Portsmouth navy-yard we have five new ships of war under construction, one large ship recently launched, and a number of other vessels anchored in the stream for want of wharf accommodation. The area of this yard is only about sixty acres, and most of it is already occupied by buildings. I have, therefore, estimated for the purchase of the whole of Seavey's Island adjacent to the yard."

I ask the attention of the committee to what Admiral Smith says next:

"The purchase of this island will furnish an additional water-power and ample space for the erection of all the workshops and storehouses that will be required to make this a first-class yard."

He does not say that this purchase is necessary for present purposes, but he wants it for the purpose of making it a first-class yard. "Besides," he says, and I call the attention of the committee to the alternative—

"Besides, the bridge constructed across the water between Seavey's Island and the navy-yard, authorized by the act of Congress, with a conditional free use of a way through the yard for the use of the residents of the island, has caused an increase of inhabitants on the island which will continue to enhance the value of the ground. This increase of population is a source of great inconvenience and embarrassment to the Government by the frequent use of the way through the yard and over the Government bridge to Kittery, so that I recommend the purchase of the whole island if it can be obtained on reasonable terms. In case such acquisition cannot be made on reasonable terms, I recommend prohibition, as provided by said act of Congress, at the discretion of the Department, of travel of every kind from said island to and through the navy-yard."

Now, it seems to me that we can conform to the recommendation of Admiral Smith in this regard, and prohibit this travel, and so attain substantially the same result without making this appropriation of $105,000.

I agree to much that has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He has paid a glowing tribute to the Navy, in which we all agree. I claim to have as great a pride in the Navy as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has, and I will do everything necessary to uphold the honor and glory of the Navy. But I am not willing, under the pressure of such arguments here, to vote away the money of my constituents unless there is a necessity for it.

Sir, while the committee report this appropriation of $105,000 for the purchase of Seavey's Island, I find, by looking through the bill, that they also recommend an appropriation of $416,000 for the Norfolk navy-yard, which the rebels burned, and $226,000, in round numbers, for the Pensacola navy-yard. While we have decreased our Navy from seven hundred vessels to one hundred vessels, and the navy-yards which we have now were ample for all purposes when we had seven hundred vessels, it is proposed to make this additional appropriation and an appropriation of $642,000 for additional navy-yards.

Now, sir, there are other considerations which ought not to be lost sight of. There is, to my mind, no satisfactory information with regard to the value of this property, and the question was well put by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] what would this island be worth were it not situated as it is in regard to the Kittery navy-yard? There is no information in regard to the value of that land which satisfies my own mind in relation to it.

And let me say here, in regard to the recommendations of Departments and of committees, about which so much has been said, that while they are entitled to all due consideration, they do not control me. If we are to take the recommendations of the Departments, what is the use of all this formula of legislation? We are here, each man acting for himself upon his own responsibility, and judging for himself upon the facts. I see no reason to change my first impression, that this amount ought not to be appropriated.

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has referred to one item in the bill appropriating some $400,000 to be expended at the Norfolk navy-yard. Will he also state to this committee that the Government lost during this rebellion from three to five millions by destruction in that same navy-yard, and we are now asked simply to provide for making some repairs, small in comparison with the value of the property previous to the commencement of the rebellion? I know that to be so from ocular demonstration, having seen the yard, which is now literally a pile of ruins, with some slight repairs here and there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, sir, I do not see what bearing that has upon my argument. My argument was that the committee proposed to make a new yard.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am very glad, indeed, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has introduced here the report of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I only regret that in quoting from that report he did not give us more of it. I will read from it also the following:
